the evidence in the cause. There can be no doubt but that the revocation of an abandonment before accepted by the underwriters, may be inferred from the conduct of the assured; if his acts and interference with the use and management of the subject insured be such as satisfactorily to show that he intended to act as owner, and not for the benefit of the underwriters. But this is always a question of intention, to be collected from the circumstances of the case, and belongs to the jury as matter of facts; and is not to be decided by the court as matter of law. We do not, however, in the present case, see any evidence which would have fairly warranted the jury in finding that the abandonment had been revoked. The injury was such as to occasion almost an actual total loss of the vessel, and there could have been no possible inducement for the assured to revoke the abandonment. There is no evidence to justify the conclusion that Stribling was acting for his own benefit, and not for that of the underwriters. The assured, by operation of law, became, after the abandonment, the agent of the underwriters, and was bound to use his utmost endeavors to rescue from destruction as much of the property as he could, so as to lighten the burden which was to fall on the underwriters. The assured had received no information from the underwriters whether they accepted or refused the abandonment. Nor did Sanderson, who professed to act as their agent, communicate any information to Stribling on that subject; and it would seem from the testimony of Thorborn that the conduct of Sanderson was calculated to cast some suspicion upon his motives. He says "he then thought, and still thinks, the course pursued by him must have been designed to perplex and embarrass the persons who were engaged in the management of the affairs of the vessel; since his letter was not delivered until the sale had *commenced, and no [144 authority was shown by him from the defendants to make arrangements for getting the vessel off, or to defray the expense that had already been incurred on her account." Although Stribling knew Sanderson, as secretary of the Columbian Insurance Company, he could not thereby know that he was clothed with authority to bind the company by whatever arrangement he should make. His authority as secretary did not clothe him with any such power. It is true Stribling did not demand of him to show his authority from the company, and this might be considered as open to the conclusion that such authority was admitted; but all this was matter for the consideration of the jury, and the court could not assume that he was or was not authorized to bind the underwriters.

In the case of The Chesapeake Insurance Company v. Stark (6 Cranch, 272), this court lays down the general rule that if an abandonment be legally made, it puts the underwriter completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the latter becomes the agent of the former; and that the acts of the agent, interfering with the subject insured, will not affect the abandonment. But the court takes a distinction between the acts of an agent and the acts of the assured; that in the latter case, any acts of ownership, by the owner himself might be construed into a relinquishment of an abandonment, which had not been accepted.

The court in that case did not say, and we think did not mean to be understood as intimating, that every such act of ownership must necessarily, and under all possible circumstances be construed into a relinquishment of an abandonment. The practical operation of so broad a rule would be extremely injurious.

It would deter owners from interfering at all for the preservation of the subject insured, and leave it to perish for fear of prejudicing their rights under the abandonment. All such acts must be judged of from the circumstances of each case. The quo animo is the criterion by which they are to be tested.

If in this case Stribling, the owner, had become the purchaser of the brig, and had got 145] her off and fitted her up, it *would have afforded very strong, if not conclusive evidence of a relinquishment of the abandonment. But such was not the fact, and whatever he did appears to have been done in good faith and with a view to the preservation of the property. But this case is very distinguishable from that of The Chesapeake Insurance Company v. Stark. There the underwriters had refused to accept the abandonment, and the court applied the rule to that case. In such a case the assured is at liberty to revoke the abandonment. But here the owner did not know whether the underwriters would refuse or accept the abandonment. No answer had been received to the letter of abandonment, and the assured was left in uncertainty as to his right of revocation. We think, therefore, that there was no act of ownership exercised by Stribling which the law would pronounce a revocation of the abandonment, or which called upon the court below to instruct the jury that they ought to infer a revocation from any such acts.

The other circumstance relied upon is that Sanderson, who professed to act as the agent of the underwriters, offered to supply the money necessary to get the vessel off and put her in a situation to pursue the voyage.

What effect this offer would have had upon the right of the assured to abandon, until the experiment to get off the vessel had been tried, provided such offer had been unconditional and made before the abandonment, either by the underwriters themselves, or by an agent fully authorized for that purpose, is a question upon which we give no opinion; the case does not require it. The authorities on this point do not appear to be in perfect harmony. (6 Mass. Rep., 484; 5 Serg. & Rawle, 509; 3 Mason, 27; 2 Term Rep., 407; 2 Wash. C. C. Rep., 347.)

The present case, however, is not accompanied with these circumstances. The abandonment here had actually been made before the offer to pay the expenses of getting off the vessel, and no answer from the underwriters had been received, nor did Sanderson undertake to decide that question for them. Although he professed to act as the agent of the underwriters he showed no authority for that 146] purpose; and *one of the witnesses swears that he thought the course pursued by him was designed to perplex the proceedings in relation to the vessel; and his letter to Thorburn, making the offer of the money, has this condition: "I reserve to the company all right of defense, in case they should not be liable for any part of the expenses attending the business.

Under such circumstances it is very clear the assured could not be required to waive an abandonment, which, from anything that he knew, might at that time have been accepted; in a case, too, where there was a clear and undeniable right to abandon.

The court below did not, therefore, err in refusing to instruct the jury that they ought to infer from the evidence that the abandonment had been revoked.

The judgment must be affirmed.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, holden in and for the County of Alexandria, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed with cost and damages at the rate of six per centum per annum.

*SAMUEL D. HARRIS, Marshal of [147
the United States for the District of Massachusetts, Plaintiff in Error,
v.

JAMES D'WOLF, JUN., Defendant in Error.

Conditional assignment of vessels and cargoes—attachment by the United States—replevin—unpaid duties—case of Conard v. Atlantic Insurance Company—failure to deliver bill of lading to assignee—Act of March 2d, 1799.

The plaintiff in replevin, James D'Wolf, claimed the merchandise under an assignment executed by George D'Wolf and John Smith to him, in consideration of a large sum of money due by them to James D'Wolf, and in consideration of advances to be made to them by him. The assignment transferred four vessels and their cargoes, three of which vessels were then at sea, and one in New York ready to sail, the property of the assignors. The assignment was to be void on the payment to James D'Wolf of the money due to him; and if it should not be paid, the assignee to enforce the pledge by process and arrest in all countries or places whatsoever, and to sell the same for the payment of the amount due by them, the assignor, to George D'Wolf. The merchandise for which this action of replevin was instituted was part of the return cargo of one of the vessels. The defendant, Harris, pleaded that the merchandise was not the property of the plaintiff, but of George D'Wolf and John Smith; and justified the taking of the goods of the plaintiff, as marshal of the District of Massachusetts, by virtue of a writ of attachment sued out in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, in which suit judgment was obtained against George D'Wolf. On the trial the plaintiff in the replevin proved the assignment, that large sums of money were due to him by George D'Wolf and John Smith, that the goods were part of the property assigned, that he had used all proper means to take possession of the goods, but was prevented by the attachment issued by the United States. The defendant proved that the goods were imported into the United States by D'Wolf and Smith, and that at the time of the importation they were indebted to the United States for duties which were due and unpaid to an amount exceeding the value of the merchandise attached, and that the Octavia, and one of the vessels assigned, with a cargo on board ready for sea, was at New York at the time of the assignment; which ship was not delivered to James D'Wolf, the assignee, nor were the bills of lading assigned, the cargoes on board the vessels being consigned to the masters for sales and returns.

BY THE COURT: In the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters, 306), it was decided that the nondelivery of a vessel assigned to secure or pay a bona fide debt did not make the assignment absolutely void. This court is well satisfied with that opinion.

The deed of assignment conveyed to the assignee a right to the proceeds of the outward-bound cargoes on board the vessels assigned to James D'Wolf.

The failure of George D'Wolf to deliver to the assignee the copies of the bills of lading which were in his possession, did not leave the property subject to the attachment of creditors, who had no notice of the deed. It was held in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company that such a transfer gives the assignee a right to take and hold those proceeds against any person but the consignee of the cargo, or purchaser from the consignee without notice.

148*] *That the consignees of the merchandise were indebted to the United States on duty bonds remaining due and unpaid at the time of the importation, did not under the sixty-second section of the Act of March 2, 1799, make the merchandise, as to the United States, the property of the consignees, notwithstanding the assignment; and make the attachment of the United States for the debt due to them sufficient to bar the action of replevin brought by the assignee.

THIS case came before the court by writ of error to the Circuit Court of Massachusetts.

In the Circuit Court the defendant in error instituted an action of replevin to recover a quantity of merchandise claimed by him under a special assignment executed to him by George D'Wolf and John Smith to secure debts bona fide due to him, and which merchandise had been seized by Samuel D. Harris, the defendant in the suit, as marshal of the United States, under executions issued at the suit of the United States against George D'Wolf and John Smith, on judgments obtained against them for duties.

The marshal claimed to hold the merchandise as subject to the executions; and the cause was tried in the Circuit Court in December, 1827, and a verdict under the charge of the court was given for the plaintiff. At the trial the defendant prayed the court to give certain instructions to the jury which the court refused to give; to which refusal the defendant excepted, and prosecuted this writ of error. These instructions appear in the opinion of the court.

The case was submitted to the court without argument by the counsel.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Court of the United States for the First Circuit and District of Massachusetts, in an action of replevin claiming the restitution of twenty-three cases of silks which had been attached at the suit of the United States, against George D'Wolf. The property was claimed by the plaintiff in replevin, under a deed dated on the 19th of November, 1822, executed by George D'Wolf and John Smith, in which they acknowledged themselves to be severally indebted to the said James D'Wolf in large sums [*149 of money, and agreed, in consideration thereof, and in consideration of other advances to be made by the said James D'Wolf, to convey, and did convey to the said James D'Wolf the ship Octavia, then lying in the port of New York nearly ready for sea, and the three brigs Quill, Arab, and Friendship, then actually at sea, their tackle, &c., and the proceeds and investments of their cargoes, &c., which said vessels and cargoes were the property of the said George D'Wolf and John Smith. To this conveyance a condition was annexed that it should be void on the payment to James D'Wolf of the money which should be due to him, on the failure to pay which it should be lawful for the said James D'Wolf at any time or times to enforce the pledge by process and arrest of the premises or any part thereof in all courts or places whatsoever, and cause the same to be sold, and the proceeds to be applied in satisfaction of the moneys which may then be due from them or either of them. The silks were part of the return cargo of one of these vessels.

The defendant pleaded that the said silks were not the property of the plaintiff, but of George D'Wolf and Smith; and justified the taking thereof, as marshal of the district, by virtue of a writ of attachment sued out of the Court of the United States for the said district, in which suit the United States obtained judgment against the said George D'Wolf.

At the trial the plaintiff proved his deed of assignment, that the silks were part of the proceeds of the cargoes of the ship Octavia and brig Arab, that he had used all proper means to take possession of them, and that they were attached by the defendant, as marshal, by virtue of process sued out by the United States. He also proved debts against George D'Wolf and John Smith, severally, on account of his advances for them, which were intended to be secured by the deed of assignment, to a very large amount.

The defendant proved that the said silks were imported into the United States, consigned to George D'Wolf and John Smith, and that at the time of the importation of said silks, said George D'Wolf and John Smith were indebted to the United States in bonds given by them respectively for *duties which were then [*150 due and unpaid, to an amount much exceeding the value of the silks replevied. The defendant also proved that at the time the deed of assignment was executed the ship Octavia lay at New York with her cargo on board, nearly ready for sea; but that possession was not delivered, nor were the bills of lading indorsed or delivered to the plaintiff. The cargoes were consigned to the several masters for sales and returns.

Many other circumstances were given by the plaintiff in evidence to show the fairness of the deed of assignment, which were met on the part of the defendant by other circumstances, on which he relied to show that in point of law it was fraudulent. These do not affect the opinions given by the Circuit Court to which exceptions were taken, and therefore are not recited.

After the testimony was closed, the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that the deed of assignment was fraudulent.

lent as to creditors, and void. This instruction the court refused to give; but left it to the jury to determine upon all the evidence of the case whether the said deed was executed with an intent to defraud or delay the creditors of the said George D'Wolf and John Smith, and if so executed, then the same was fraudulent and void as to such creditors.

As the whole question of fraud was submitted to the jury, it is incumbent on the plaintiff in error, if he would support this exception, to show some defect in the deed itself, which makes it absolutely void as to creditors, whatever may be the fairness of intent with which it was executed. He relies on the fact that possession of the Octavia was not delivered as making the deed of assignment absolutely void.

This question was decided upon full consideration in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters, 386), and this court is well satisfied with that opinion.

The counsel for the defendant also prayed the court to instruct the jury that although the deed of assignment might be valid, it could not transfer a right to the proceeds of the outward-bound cargoes; which instruction the court refused to give.

151*] *This question also is decided in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company.

The counsel for the plaintiff also moved the court to instruct the jury that the failure of George D'Wolf and John Smith to deliver to James D'Wolf the copies of the bills of lading which were in their possession, severally, when the bills of lading were executed, leaves the property subject to the attachment of creditors who had no notice of the deed. This instruction the court refused to give.

In the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company the court determined that a deed of assignment such as was executed in this case, was capable of transferring the right to the proceeds of the outward cargo as between the parties; of consequence such transfer gives the assignee a right to take those proceeds and hold them against any person but the consignee of the cargo, or person who is a purchaser from the consignee, without notice. These principles were settled in the case which has been already cited.

The counsel also moved the court to instruct the jury, that if the consignees of the said silks were at the time indebted to the United States on duty bonds remaining due and unpaid, then, that by virtue of the sixty-second section of the Act for the collection of duties, passed the 2d of March, 1799, the said goods were, as to the United States, the goods of the said consignees, notwithstanding the said deed, and in the legal custody of the said collector; and that the attachment in favor of the United States was good and sufficient to bar the action.

This instruction was refused.

This question was considered and determined in the case of Harris v. Dennie, decided at this term.

The questions raised in this cause have all been decided in this court as they were decided by the Circuit Court. There is no error in the opinions to which exceptions have been taken, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

*JOHN BEATY, Plaintiff in error, [*152
v.

THE LESSEE OF A. KNOWLER ET AL.,
Defendant in Error.

Tax sale—provision in act that it should be "public"—authority of a corporation—construction of charter.

Ejectment. The defendant claimed the land in controversy under a tax sale which was made by a company incorporated by the Legislature of Connecticut in 1796 called "the proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie," and incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Ohio, passed on the 15th of April, 1803, by the name of "The proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie, called the sufferers' land." In 1806 the Legislature of Ohio imposed a land tax, and authorized the sale of the lands in the State for unpaid taxes, giving to the owners the right to redeem within one year after the determination of their minority. This act was in force in 1808. In 1808 the directors of the company, incorporated by the Legislatures of Connecticut and Ohio, assessed two cents per acre on the lands of the company for the payment of the tax laid by the State of Ohio, and authorized the sale of those lands on which the assessments were not paid. The lands purchased by the defendant were the property of minors at the time of the sale, they having been sold to pay the said assessments under the authority of the directors of the company. Held, that the sale of the land under which the defendant claimed was void.

The provisions in the Act of Incorporation of Ohio that it should be considered a public act must be regarded in courts, and its enactments noticed without being specially pleaded, as would be necessary if the act were private. [167]

That a corporation is strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are specifically conferred on it will not be denied. The exercise of the corporate franchise, being restrictive of individual rights, cannot be extended beyond the letter and spirit of the Act of Incorporation. [168]

From a careful inspection of the whole act, it clearly appears that the incorporation of the company was designed to enable the proprietors to accomplish specific objects, and that no more power was given than was considered necessary to attain those objects. [171]

The words, "all necessary expenses of the company," cannot be so construed to enlarge the power to tax, which is given for specific purposes. A tax by the State is not a necessary expense of the company, within the meaning of the act. Such an expense can only result from the action of the company in the exercise of its corporate powers. [171]

The provision in the tenth section, "that the directors shall have power to do whatever shall appear to them to be necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering of the interests of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State," was not intended to give unlimited power, but the exercise of a discretion within the scope of the authority conferred. [171]

FROM the Circuit Court of Ohio.

This was an ejectment for lands in the State of Ohio; and on the trial in the Circuit Court the defendant excepted to the charge of the court, and prosecuted this writ of error.

*The facts are fully stated in the [*153 opinion of the court.

The case was argued by Mr. J. C. Wright for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Vinton for the defendant.

Note—Corporation, limited to the exercise of the powers specially conferred upon it.

A corporation has no power except what is given by its incorporation act, either expressly or as incidental to its existence, and its express power. Beaty v. Knowler, supra; affirming S. C., 1 McLean, 41; Perrine v. Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Co., 9 How., 172; Russell v. Topping, 5 Mc-

Mr. Wright contended that the court below erred in their instruction to the jury.

1. In instructing the jury that the directors of the company incorporated by the Legislature of Connecticut in the year 1796, designated as "The proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie," and by a law of Ohio passed the 15th of April, 1830, had no legal authority to assess the tax on the land for the nonpayment of which it was sold.

2. That the proprietors of the land included in the provisions of the acts, who were minors, were not bound by the assessment of the tax and the sale of the land.

He said the only questions which arose on the case are these; nothing else was excepted to on the trial.

Those instructions involve the construction of certain laws of Connecticut and of the State of Ohio, which, in general, have received no interpretation from the courts in those States.

The correctness of the instructions will depend on the law of Ohio, that of Connecticut having been introduced to show the history of the transaction out of which this controversy has arisen. But as the company was organized under the law of Ohio, and in a manner entirely different from that of the law of Connecticut, and the tax was laid according to its provisions, that is to be put out of the question.

It was objected to the validity of the assessment of the tax that the charter does not authorize the directors to assess a tax to pay that levied by the Legislature of Ohio. It is conceded at once that the power is not given in express terms, but is fully included in the several powers to assess a tax. Act of the 15th of April, 1803, sec. 2.

The plain and obvious reading of this grant of power is, "to defray all necessary expenses of the said company in purchasing and extinguishing the Indian claim of title, surveying, locating, making partition of the land; and to 154"] defray *all other necessary expenses of said company, power is given," &c.

Two descriptions of powers are confided to the directors by this provision. The first relates to expenses necessary for specified objects, and the second is equally plenary to all purposes; "to defray the necessary expenses of the said company."

This power is also included in the tenth section of the act, "to do whatever shall to them appear necessary and proper for the well ordering and interest of the company, not contrary to the laws of the State.

If the directors, in the exercise of their discretion, thought the money to be raised by this assessment was proper to defray necessary expenses, or useful for the well ordering of the company, they had full power to lay the tax. It would be difficult to employ words to convey a more unlimited discretion to the directors, and their view in laying the tax is clearly developed in the vote:

"Voted, unanimously, that a tax of two cents on the pound be assessed to defray the expenses of a tax laid by the Legislature of Ohio, &c., and all other necessary expenses for the good of the proprietors of the said land."

If the directors had power to assess the tax, then, 2. Were the infant lessors bound by the assessment?

It will hardly be contended that minors cannot in any event be clothed with powers as corporators; that is indisputable. The resolve of the State of Connecticut released and quit-claimed to eighteen hundred individuals named in the act, the half million of acres, "and to their legal representatives where dead, and to their heirs and assigns forever." (Swan's Ohio Land Laws, 81 to 100.) The ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff was then alive, and one of the persons named in the resolve. He took an estate in fee as a tenant in common with all the others. In 1792 Connecticut constituted these grantees a corporation, and gave them, their heirs and assigns, succession as corporators; and provided that the expenses and taxes should only be a charge on the land. The ancestor of the plaintiff's lessors, with the other grantees, organized the corporation under this act, and partook of all the powers it conferred. By his death in 1800, *the in- [155 terest he held in the land devolved upon his heirs subject to the corporation; and by the very terms of the charter they took his place as corporators, representing together in the corporation the interest their parent had represented alone. These heirs were owners and proprietors of their ancestor's share in the lands when Ohio incorporated them with all "the owners and proprietors." This suit was brought in 1825, when all the heirs were probably of age, as the tax was laid in 1808.

Under the law, the lands were divided, and two thousand four hundred acres were set

It is a general rule that corporations can only act in the manner prescribed by law. Their power is derived only from their act of incorporation. Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, 127.

A corporation has only such powers as its charter gives, either expressly, or as incident to its existence. Without clear legislative authority to do so, no corporation can mortgage its franchises. Authority to mortgage its "road, income, and other property," does not authorize a mortgage of its franchises, though such authority includes the power to make a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. Pullan v. Cincinnati R. R. Co., 4 Biss., 35.

A corporation has power to make commercial notes without express authority. Matter of Herule M. L. Assurance Soc., 6 Ben., 35.

A corporation created by statute has no rights and can exercise no powers except such as are expressly given or necessarily implied. Huntington v. Savings Bank, 6 Otto, 388; Wheeling v. Mayor of Baltimore, 1 Hugh., 90.

Notwithstanding the liberality of construction of conferred powers, it must still be regarded as the rule that a corporation can exercise no powers to take and hold property except what is given by its act of incorporation, either expressly, or such as are incidental to its express powers. apart for the interest of Douglass, the ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff. This division the lessors recognize and ratify. They bring suit for a part of the allotment assigned to them in the division, and not for an undivided sixth of the two thousand four hundred acres, part of the five hundred thousand acres. They avail themselves of the Act of Incorporation, and yet claim they are not corporators, nor bound by the acts of the directors under it.

The adult, as well as the minor heirs, have all gone on as corporators. No dissent was ever expressed; but, on the contrary, all, as one, represent the share. If these minors are not bound by the acts of the corporation, all remains as at the death of their ancestor in 1808, and the partition must be gone into anew; and the separate allotment, under which the forest has disappeared and the wilderness has been made to blossom as the rose, is all to be done away, and the lands thrown into common. Everything in the country will thus be thrown into confusion.

Would this be just to the co-tenants? and yet it is the inevitable result of the principles given in the instructions to the jury.

Mr. Vinton, for the defendant in error, contended,

1. That the lessors of the defendant in error were not parties to or bound by said acts of incorporation.

2. That the directors under the Ohio Act of Incorporation had no power to assess a tax to pay a State tax of that State.

3. That the tax was void for uncertainty, it being assessed in part for undefined purposes.

156* 4. That the sale being conducted contrary to the manner prescribed by the laws of Ohio, was void.

5. The sale was void because the collector omitted to give the notice required by said Act of Incorporation of the time when the tax would become due.

It has been holden by this court that a grant to a private corporation is a contract; and consequently, to bind the corporators, their assent, express or implied, must be had. (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 659, 657, 682; Ellis v. Marshall, 2 Mass., 275, 279.)

It therefore becomes necessary to inquire if this is a private corporation, and, if so, whether the defendants in error had, by their assent, express or implied, made themselves parties to it. In 4 Wheat., 668, 669, public corporations are defined "to be such only as are founded by the government for public purposes, where the whole interests belong also to the government." This definition will test the character of the corporation in question. The entire interest of this corporation consisted of private property, and the purpose of the act was the regulation of that property for the benefit of the proprietors.

The government of Ohio had no interest in the corporation, nor did it seek to attain any purpose of its own by the Act of Incorporation. The declared objects of the act were to enable the proprietors of the sufferers' lands "to extinguish the Indian title, to survey them into townships or otherwise, and make partition of them among themselves." These are all private purposes, intended for their own emolument and advantage. The corporation is, therefore, in its nature, a private corporation. Here an inquiry arises as to the effect of the last section of the Act of Incorporation, which declares that act to be a public act. A similar enactment has been introduced into the bank charters of that State which no one ever imagined to be public corporations on that account. The evident intention of this declaration is not to change the nature of the corporation, but to relieve the corporators from the inconvenience of special pleading and making proof of their corporate existence, according to the usages of the common law. To this extent the provision is politic and reasonable; but to go beyond that 157 and give it the effect of making the corporation a public corporation in the sense of the definition laid down, would be unreasonable, and according to the principles settled by this court in the Dartmouth College case, not in the power of the Legislature of Ohio. (4 Wheat., 671, 672.)

This brings us to the question of assent. No express assent by the defendants in error to this Act of Incorporation is pretended.

An implied assent is relied upon. Jonathan Douglass, the ancestor of the defendants in error, died in 1800. The Act of Incorporation by the Legislature of Ohio was passed in 1803. And in 1808 the land in controversy was sold to pay a tax assessed under that act. At the time of the sale four of the defendants in error were minors, and, consequently, not able in law to contract or assent to become corporators.

Assent, in such a case, is not one of the exceptions to the legal disabilities of infants. Lapse

All incidental powers may be exercised by them or by their officers or agents. Smith v. Eureka Mills, 6 Cal., 1.

Besides the express and substantive powers conferred by their charters, corporations take, by implication, all the reasonable modes of executing such powers which a natural person may adopt in the exercise of similar powers. *New England Fire and Marine Ins. But powers that would impair vested rights are never raised by implication, nor is a principal power or grant conferred by statute or charter to be construed to carry, as an incident, anything not implied in the principal; not usually appurtenant to it, and not possessed of a similar character. Nor can it be held to include anything which would have been refused as a principal thing, or anything which, on the most liberal construction, is not necessary and proper to carry the principal express powers into effect. *Morris & Essex R. of time is relied upon to raise a presumption of assent; the common law fixes the period at which the presumption arises at the end of twenty years, which had not elapsed when this suit was instituted. The counsel for the plaintiff in error has argued that the present claimants took the estate of their ancestor as he left it; and has, on this ground, endeavored to make out the power of the Legislature of Ohio to bind them by its act because the Legislature of Connecticut had, in 1796, incorporated the proprietors of these land to enable them to effect similar objects.

There is no proof that Jonathan Douglass ever gave his assent to the Connecticut act, and if he did, it has no connection with the present case. The affairs of the Connecticut corporation were conducted by a board differently organized and called by a different name from the board of directors which assessed the tax under which the land in controversy was sold. The proceedings now called in question were had under the act of Ohio. Douglass died in 1800, and it could not be one of the conditions on which his heirs inherited his estate, that they should become parties to an act of incorporation that the State of Ohio, which then had 158] *no being as a State, might pass three years after his death. Nor does it follow that because the ancestor or his heirs were parties to one corporation, that therefore they were bound to become parties to a new and distinct corporation, created by another and independent authority. It has been urged upon the court that if this doctrine prevail it will overturn a great amount of property; but that no more proves the fact of assent than if it would only overturn a small amount. It has been further contended that the suit now pending is predicated from the partition made by the directors under the Ohio Act of Incorporation, and, consequently, affirms their proceedings and estops the defendants in error from denying the fact of their assent. No principle of law is better settled than that one tenant in common may bring an ejectment against his companion to be let into possession. Every such tenant has a right to the common enjoyment of the whole and every part of the premises, and against all strangers he has an exclusive right of possession to the whole and every part thereof. From this principle it follows, as a necessary consequence, that he has a right to his possessory action against such stranger for the whole or any part of the premises. The suit, then, against the plaintiff in error as a trespasser upon a specific part of this grant of the land, is no admission by the defendants of a partition; and, consequently, is no affirmance of the partition, if any was made by the directors, which the record does not show.

2. The second point denies the authority of the directors to assess the tax in question. In the case of Head v. Providence Insurance Company (2 Cranch, 167; 1 Condens. Rep., 371), the court say that "a corporation may correctly be said to be precisely what the Incorporating Act has made it, to derive all its powers from that act, and to be capable of exerting its faculties only in the manner that act authorizes;" and in 4 Wheat., 636, this court defines a corporation in these words: "It is the mere creature of the law, and possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence." Its powers are, therefore, to be construed strictly. *To determine the [159 question of the power of the directors to assess the tax, it is necessary to look into the Incorporating Act, and to examine it in all its parts.

It is not pretended that the act confers an express grant of power to assess the tax. The inquiry then arises, was the power incidental to the existence of the corporation? A formal and specific enumeration of the purposes for which the corporation was created is set out in the preamble, and also in the second section of the act.

They are, "to extinguish the Indian title to the grant of a half million acres of land, to survey and locate the same into townships or otherwise, and to make partition among the proprietors." To effect these objects, and to defray all other necessary expenses of said company, power was given to the directors to levy taxes. Was the tax assessed by the State of Ohio a company charge or expense? The tax of the State was a lien upon the estate of each tenant in common, which his companion was no more bound to pay than he would be to discharge the lien of a judgment at law or a mortgage of his co-tenant. The twenty-third section of the Act of Ohio assessing the State tax, is conclusive of this point.

It enacts that when any tract of land charged with tax is owned by two or more persons, the collector shall receive from any person tendering the same, his or her proportion of the tax due thereon.

Under this provision of the act, any one of the proprietors might, by paying his proportion of the tax, discharge the lien of the State upon his estate. And his interest could no more be affected by the sale of the right of his companion for nonpayment than if that right were conveyed away by the companion himself, or sold to pay a judgment at law. The tax of the State, then, was not a company charge; nor was the payment of it by the company in any way necessary or incidental to the existence of the corporation. Again, was the aid of the corporation necessary to enable the State to collect its tax? The power of the State to collect its own taxes by its own agents cannot be denied.

If, therefore, we find the State did create its own agents *for the collection of this [160 tax, and put into their hands all the necessary means to discharge this duty, every presumption in favor of collecting it by the agents of the corporation is excluded. On looking into the tax law of Ohio, we find the tax covered all the lands in the State, the company's lands included; that agents were appointed to collect all the tax without any exception; for this purpose the State was divided into collection districts, one of which embraced the land in controversy. The aid of the company, therefore, was not necessary to a perfect execution of the law of Ohio; and the means provided by the Legislature for its execution excludes the idea that it relied upon this corporation for any such assistance as it thought proper to volunteer.

But it has been insisted that the tenth section of the Act of Incorporation confers upon the directors the power to assess a tax to pay a tax of the State. It empowers them, in general terms, to do whatever to them shall appear necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering and interest of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of Ohio. This section contains no specific and substantive grant of power. It ought, therefore, to be construed to be a general grant of the means necessary and proper for the execution of the specified purposes of the act of incorporation.

So understood it does not, in fact, enlarge the powers of the corporation, and seems to have been introduced into the act from abundant caution.

3. Before the examination of the remaining points, it may be proper to notice an objection that has been urged by the opposing counsel. It is insisted that we are not at liberty to present either of these points to the court because they do not form part of the opinion of the court below to which exceptions were taken at the trial. The objection is predicated from the supposition that the writ of error was sued out to reverse the opinion of the court, instead of the judgment itself. The writ covers the whole record; and if it shall appear from an inspection of it that there is no error in the judgment, it cannot be reversed, whatever may be the errors in the opinion of the court.

The record sets out the proof of the title of 161) the plaintiffs *below. It is a perfect title. The title of the defendant below, as proved by him, is also spread upon the record. If that title is defective, it cannot avail him against the perfect title of his opponents. We are, therefore, at liberty to examine that title as it appears on the record.

The third objection, then, is that the tax was void, being assessed in part for undefined purposes. The objects of the tax are declared in the resolution of assessment to be "to defray the expenses of a tax laid by the State of Ohio, and other necessary expenses for the good of the proprietors of the said land." The taxing power of the corporation is limited to certain purposes specified in the Incorporating Act, which would doubtless include the means necessary and proper for the full attainment of those purposes. It must be exercised within those limits, and in such a manner that it can be known with certainty whether they have been exceeded. If otherwise, its assumptions of power could neither be detected nor controlled. For example, let it be conceded that the corporation had no power to assess a tax to pay a tax of the State; is it not apparent that a tax for that purpose might be assessed under the vague terms "for the good of the proprietors?" The undefined portion of the tax must therefore be void.

The tax is one entire and indivisible thing, and if void for part, it must be for the whole. It cannot be ascertained how much of the land in controversy, if any part of the tax was authorized, was sold to pay the valid, and how much the invalid portion of the tax.

4. The sale was contrary to the laws of Ohio. By the tenth section of the Act of Incorporation the directors were restrained from doing those things that were contrary to the laws of the State. The collectors of the State tax were required to reside in their collection districts, to give bond and security to the State for the faithful collection and paying over the tax to the State treasurer. The sale and collection in this case was made by a company collector, residing in a distant State, who gave no bond to the State nor was in any manner accountable to it. The sale was made without the reservation of the right of redemption, which the law of *Ohio secured to infants and [162 to others laboring under legal disabilities. The collectors for the corporation exacted fees and charges not allowed by the laws of Ohio, and thus increased the amount of the tax beyond what the State collector was authorized to receive.

In all these particulars and others that might be enumerated, the sale was contrary to the settled law and policy of Ohio, and therefore vicious.

5. Admitting the corporation had the power to assess and collect the tax in question, still, in making the collection, the company's collector did not conform to all the requisites prescribed to him by the Act of Incorporation. That act requires the collector to give notice of the time when the tax became due by advertising the same for at least three weeks in a newspaper published in each of the counties of New Haven, Fairfield, and New London, in the State of Connecticut. If the tax was not then paid, the collector was required to make another and further publication of the time and place of sale, for default of payment.

The record shows an advertisement of sale for nonpayment, but does not show that proof was made of an advertisement of the time when the tax became due. The cases of Williams v. Peyton (4 Wheat., 79, 83), and of Parker v. Rule's Lessee (9 Cranch, 64), are expressly in point, and they show conclusively that the advertisement cannot be presumed in the absence of proof, and that its omission is a fatal irregularity.

Mr. Wright, in reply, contended that the provisions of the law of Ohio under which the tax was assessed laid the tax on the whole body of the lands owned by the eighteen hundred persons. It was a common charge on the whole lands, which at the time were held by the proprietors undivided. It was consequently a necessary expense upon the company, for which the directors were authorized to provide by the assessment of a tax. The law of Ohio looked to the land for the tax, and required the collectors to sell for the collection of it; and for the tax due on an entire undivided tract, an entire portion of the whole was directed to be sold. An *attempt to sell in parcels [163 would be to make a partition among the proprietors. No one could pay his own tax and preserve his own share, because he owned no specific part; his joint interest would be more or less prejudiced if any sale for taxes of the entire tract took place.

He proceeded to show, by a reference to the law of Ohio laying the tax, further difficulties which would have attended the sale of part of the whole body of the land for the tax; and he argued that the payment of the tax by the directors was necessary to preserve the lands of the company.

It is said the tenth section of the Act of Incorporation confers no power to tax. That section was intended to give some power, and it authorizes that to be done which is "necessary and proper for the well ordering and interests of the owners and proprietors." These terms fully comprehend the power, and authorized the doing of that which would save the property from sale under the State law.

It is objected that the assessment is void for uncertainty, being in part for undefined purposes. It was for the Ohio tax, and other necessary expenses for the good of the proprietors of the land. While it is admitted that it ought to have mentioned the objects, it is denied that it was required that they should be specified. Were they for the general interests and for the general good? This has not been denied.

In the Act of Incorporation there is no reservation in favor of minors. In the general law, minors are allowed to redeem in a year after attaining adult years. In what manner? Not by treating the sale as void, but by paying the tax, interest and penalties, and for the improvements. These requisites suppose the sale valid.

But the question before the court is one of power, not of policy. The omission of the Legislature to make a politic provision concerning the rights of minors, does not deny the right; on the contrary, it admits the power. It cannot be maintained that this affects the validity of the sale. All the incapacities, and all the privileges of minors are the mere creatures of municipal law. The state of minority itself is created and regulated by that law, and the period of its duration varies in different States.

164*] *The Act of Incorporation of Ohio operated upon adults and on minors alike. No distinction is made in respect to their rights. The courts cannot originate such distinction.

No authorities have been adduced in support of our positions. They are supposed to rest on principles familiar to the profession. Their application to the case before the court cannot be tested by precedent, for the whole case is one sui generis. The analogies illustrative of their application result more directly from the principles themselves than from adjudged cases, which can bear but remotely upon an insulated controversy. (Cited, Knowler, Douglass et al. v. Coit, 1 Ohio Rep., 519.)

Mr. Justice McLEAN delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment, brought in the Circuit Court of Ohio, to recover possession of one thousand two hundred acres of land, parcel of two thousand four hundred acres, in what is called the Connecticut Reserve.

On the trial below, it was agreed that Jonathan Douglass, the ancestor of the plaintiff's lessors, became proprietor of the premises in question in May, 1793, under the laws of Connecticut granting lands to certain sufferers, and died the 6th of March, 1800, vested with the legal title, which he held in common with many other proprietors, the land not being set apart or apportioned to any one of the whole. That the lessors of the plaintiff were his heirs-at-law, and held as partners or tenants in common.

On the trial it was proved by the plaintiff below that on the 5th of May, 1808, four of the lessors were minors.

The defendant set up a title under a tax sale, which was made by the company incorporated for the management of said lands.

This company was first incorporated by the Connecticut Legislature in the year 1796. No person is named in the act, but the corporators are designated as "The proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie." Under this law the corporation was organized. In 1797 the Connecticut Legislature passed an amendment to this law.

*On the 15th of April, 1803, the Leg- [165 islature of Ohio passed an act incorporating those owners and proprietors by the name of "The proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie, called sufferers' land;" and by that name gave succession to them, their heirs and assigns.

This was called the sufferers' land, from the circumstance of its having been given by the State of Connecticut to indemnify the losses its citizens had sustained in the Revolutionary War.

The Act of Incorporation by the Legislature of Ohio required nine directors to be appointed, who were authorized to hold their meetings out of the State. In the second section power is given to the directors to extinguish the Indian title; to survey the land into townships, or otherwise to make partition as they should order among the owners, in proportion to the amount of loss; and amongst other things the act provided "that to defray all necessary expenses of said company in purchasing and in extinguishing the Indian claim of title to the land, surveying, locating, and making partition thereof, as aforesaid, and all other necessary expenses of said company, power be, and the same is hereby given to, and vested in the said directors and their successors in office, to levy a tax or taxes (two-thirds of the directors present agreeing thereto) on said land, and have power to enforce the collection thereof."

The ninth section provides "that all sales of rights, or parts of rights, of any owner or proprietor in said half million acres of land, made by the collector, shall be good and valid, so as to secure an absolute title in the purchaser; unless the said owner and proprietor shall redeem the same within six calendar months next after the sale thereof, by paying the taxes for which the said right or rights, or parts thereof, had been sold, with twelve per cent. interest thereon, and costs of suit." The act contains no provision in favor of the rights of infants or femes covert.

By the tenth section of this law it is provided, "that said directors shall have power and authority, and the same is hereby given to them and their successors, to do whatever shall to them appear necessary and proper to be done for *the well ordering and interest of [166 said owners and proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State." The eleventh directs that "supplies of money which shall remain in the hands of the treasurer after the Indian title shall be extinguished and said land located and partition thereof made, shall be used by said directors for the laying out and improving the public road in said tract, as this Assembly shall direct." The act is declared to be a public one in the twelfth section.

An act imposing a land tax was passed by the Ohio Legislature in 1806, which remained in force in 1808. This act required entry to be made of lands for taxation. A perpetual lien was imposed on the land, whether entered or not, for the amount of the tax, and minors had a right to redeem their land sold for taxes within one year after their minority expired. It appeared in proof, at the trial, that at a meeting of the directors of the company convened at the court-house in New Haven, on Thursday, the 5th of May, 1808, agreeably to a notification duly issued according to the ordinances of said directors, it was unanimously voted by six directors, being all that were present, that a tax of two cents on the pound, original loss, be assessed on the original rights or losses, in said half million acres of land, to be paid by each proprietor thereof, in proportion to each person's respective share or loss, as set in the grant of said lands made by the State of Connecticut; to be collected and paid by the several collectors to the treasurer of this company on or before the 1st of July, 1808, to defray the expenses of a tax laid by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, and other necessary expenses for the good of the proprietors of said land.

The defendant gave in evidence the assessment of a tax upon the rights of the said Jonathan Douglass, the appointment of a collector, the issuing of a warrant of collection, the advertisement of sale for taxes, the sale of a part of the right of said Douglass, amounting to twelve hundred acres, for taxes, to Elias Perkins, who conveyed the tract to the defendant.

The Circuit Court instructed the jury that the directors had no power to assess said tax, and that the infant lessors were not concluded or bound by such assessment. To these instructions the defendant excepted. The jury found a verdict of guilty, and judgment was rendered thereon.

A reversal of this judgment is prayed for by the plaintiff in error on the following grounds:

1. The court erred in their instruction to the jury that the directors had no legal authority to assess the tax.

2. That the minor proprietors were not bound and concluded by the assessment and sale.

It is not contended in this case that this company could derive corporate powers to do any act in Ohio in relation to the sufferers' land under the statute of Connecticut. All their powers must be derived from the law of Ohio. This law, it is insisted, is a private act, not designed for public purposes, and, consequently, cannot affect the rights of any individual who did not assent to its provisions. That the provision declaring it to be a public act does not alter the principle, for the rights derived under it are of a private nature, being limited to those who have an interest in the land; and it is denied that any evidence of assent has been shown by the lessors of the plaintiff or their ancestor.

Several authorities were cited as having a bearing upon the objections thus stated. The names of the sufferers are published in the Connecticut act or resolution in 1792, with the amount allowed to each as his indemnity for losses sustained. In this act is found the name of the ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff. Peters 4.

His right descended to them, subject to the same conditions by which it was originally held.

The provision of the law of incorporation that it should be considered a public act must be regarded in courts of justice, and its enactments noticed without being specially pleaded, as would be necessary if the act were private.

That a private act of incorporation cannot affect the rights of individuals who do not assent to it, and that in this respect it is considered in the light of a contract, is a position too clear to admit of controversy. But, in the present case, this objection seems not to have been made in the court below; where proof of the assent, if necessary, might have been submitted to the jury.

*From the nature of the right asserted 168 and the circumstances under which it was originated, this court cannot doubt that the assent of the proprietors may be fairly presumed both to the act of Connecticut and to that of Ohio. Rights have been protected and regulated under those laws, and to the provisions of the latter are the claimants indebted, in a great degree, for the present value of the remainder of the land which they still hold; and, as has been well argued, if they participate in the benefits of the law, they can set up no exemption from its penalties.

The main question in the case is whether the directors have the power, under the Act of Incorporation, to assess a tax on each proprietor's share to pay a tax to the State. That a corporation is strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are specifically conferred on it, will not be denied. The exercise of the corporate franchise, being restrictive of individual rights, cannot be extended beyond the letter and spirit of the Act of Incorporation. In the second section of the act, power is given to the directors to extinguish the Indian title, under the authority of the United States, when obtained; to survey and locate the land into townships, or otherwise to make partition; and to defray all necessary expenses in carrying these objects into effect; and to meet these and "all other necessary expenses of said company," the directors are authorized to levy a tax or taxes on said land, and to enforce the collection thereof. As the power to tax for the purpose of paying a tax to the State is not found among the enumerated powers of the directors, it must be derived, if it exist, under the words, "all other necessary expenses of said company;" or under the tenth section, which provides that "the directors shall have power to do whatever to them shall appear necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering and interest of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State." In favor of this construction, it has been ingeniously argued that partition not having been made of the land it could not be entered for taxation as required by the law of the State. That the half million of acres must be entered on the duplicate of the collector as one tract, and that it would be impracticable for the collector to as- 169 certain and collect from each proprietor his just proportion of the tax. That many of the proprietors are nonresidents, and that any proportion of them being desirous of paying their part of the tax would not be discharged by doing so; as a part of the entire tract, involving their interests, would be liable to be sold for any balance of the tax which remained unpaid.

Whether partition was made of the land when the directors assessed the tax does not appear, nor is it considered a fact of much importance in the case. No argument drawn from convenience can enlarge the powers of the corporation. Was the tax imposed a "necessary expense of said company," within the meaning of the act?

That these words would cover the expense of necessary agents to assess and collect a tax legitimately imposed by the directors, is clear, and also other incidental expenses, arising from carrying into effect the powers expressly given; but do they invest the directors with a new and substantive power? If they do, how is the exercise of the power to be limited? Must it depend upon the discretion of the directors to determine all necessary expenses of the company.

Ample provisions are found in the State law imposing a land tax for the assessment and collection of the tax. A lien is held on all the taxable land in the State, whether entered for taxation or not; and if the tax should not be paid by a time specified, the collector was authorized, after giving notice, to sell the smallest part of the tract which would bring the amount of the tax.

For the convenience of nonresidents, district collectors were appointed, who were required to hold their offices at places named in the act. The collector for the district including the sufferers' land held his office at Warren, within what is called the Reservation of Connecticut.

The law imposing the tax operates upon the land in controversy and raises a lien, the same as on any other taxable lands in the State.

It appears, therefore, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to look to the corporation for the payment of the tax assessed under the law, but to the land, as in all other 170 cases. And if any part of the land had been sold by the State in which minors had an interest under the law, they had a right to redeem it within a year after they became of age. This is an important provision, and is not contained in the Act of Incorporation.

The agents of the State were paid for their services out of the tax collected; those of the corporation by the company. It would seem, therefore, that the tax collected by the State would be less expensive to the proprietors than if collected by their own agents, and less hazardous to their rights, as the interests of minors were protected. If, therefore, the argument drawn from convenience could have any influence, it could not operate favorably to the power of the directors.

The power to impose a tax on real estate, and to sell it where there is a failure to pay the tax, is a high prerogative, and should never be exercised where the right is doubtful.

In the preamble of the Ohio Act of Incorporation there is a reference in the Connecticut Act, and to the cession of the reserve by that State to the Union, and a statement that it was annexed to the State of Ohio. And as a reason for the passage of the act, it is stated that said "half million of acres of land are now within the limits of Trumbull County in said State, and are still subject to Indian claims of title; wherefore, to enable the owners and proprietors of said half million acres of land to purchase and extinguish the Indian claim of title to the same (under the authority of the United States, when the same shall be obtained), to survey and locate the said land, and to make partition thereof to and among said owners and proprietors in proportion to the amount of losses, which is or shall be by them respectively owned," &c. These are the objects to be accomplished by the Act of Incorporation, and which could not be attained by the individual efforts of the proprietors. In the eleventh section of the act it is provided "that supplies of money which shall remain in the hands of the treasurer after the Indian title shall be extinguished and said land located and partition thereof made, shall be used by said directors for the laying out and *improving the [171] public roads in said tract, as the Legislature should direct."

From a careful inspection of the whole act, it clearly appears that the incorporation of the company was designed to enable the proprietors to accomplish specific objects, and that no more power was given than was considered necessary to attain these objects.

The words "all necessary expenses of the company" cannot be so construed as to enlarge the power to tax, which is given for specific purposes. A tax to the State is not a necessary expense of the company within the meaning of the act. Such an expense can only result from the action of the company in the exercise of its corporate powers.

The provision in the tenth section, that the "directors shall have power to do whatever shall appear to them to be necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering of the interest of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State," was not intended to give unlimited power, but the exercise of a discretion within the scope of the authority conferred.

If the words of this section are not to be restricted by the other provisions of the statute, but to be considered according to their literal import, they would vest in the directors a power over the land only limited by their discretion. They could dispose of the land and vest the proceeds in any manner which they might suppose would advance the interest of the proprietors. It is only necessary to state this consequence to show the danger of such a construction. The restrictions imposed in other parts of the statute very clearly demonstrate that it was not the intention of the Legislature to invest the directors with such a power. Upon a full view of the various provisions of the Act of Incorporation, the court do not find a power given to the directors to assess a tax, as has been done in the case under consideration, to pay a tax to the State. The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be affirmed with costs.

172*] *JOHN V. WILCOX AND THOMAS WILCOX

v.

THE EXECUTORS OF KEMP PLUMMER.

Assumpsit—malpractice by an attorney—when statute of limitation began to run.

Action of assumpsit to recover from the defendant, in the character of an attorney-at-law, the amount of a loss sustained by reason of neglect or unskillful conduct.

A promissory note was, by the plaintiff, placed in the hands of P. for collection. He instituted a suit in the State court thereon against the drawer on the 7th of May, 1820, but neglected to do so against the indorser. The drawer proved insolvent. On the 8th of February, 1821, he sued the indorser, but committed a fatal mistake by a misnomer of the plaintiffs; upon which, after passing through the successive courts of the State, a judgment of nonsuit was finally rendered against the plaintiffs. Before that time, the action against the indorser was barred by the statute of limitations, to wit, on the 9th of November, 1822. This suit was instituted on the 27th of January, 1825. The statute of limitations of North Carolina interposes a bar to actions of assumpsit after three years.

The questions in the case were whether the statute of limitation commenced running when the error was committed in the commencement of the action against the indorser, or whether it commenced from the time the actual damage was sustained by the plaintiffs by the judgment of nonsuit. Whether the statute runs from the time the action accrued, or from the time that the damage was developed or became definite. Held, that the statute began to run from the time of committing the error by the misnomer in the action against the indorser.

The ground of action here is a contract to act diligently and skillfully, and both the contract and the breach of it admit of a definite assignment of date. When might this action have been brought, is the question, for from that time the statute must run.

When the attorney was chargeable with negligence or unskillfulness his contract was violated, and the action might have been sustained immediately. Perhaps in that event, no more than nominal damages may be proved, and no more recovered; but, on the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the proof of actual damage may extend to facts that occur and grow out of the injury, even up to the day of the verdict. If so, it is clear that the damage is not the cause of the action.

THIS case came before the court on a division of opinion between the judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of North Carolina.

It was an action of assumpsit, to which was pleaded the statute of limitations.

It was alleged, and proof offered, that on the 28th of January, 1820, the testator of the de-173*] fendants, who was a collecting attorney, accustomed to collect for John V. Wilcox & Co., received from them for collection a note which had been drawn by Edmund Banks, on the 2d of October, 1819, payable to John Hawkins two months after date, and by him indorsed, on the 9th of November, 1819, to Hinton & Brame, and by them, subsequently, to the plaintiffs.

On the 7th of February, 1820, the testator, Kemp Plummer, instituted a suit in the name of John V. Wilcox and Thomas Wilcox, who composed the firm of John V. Wilcox & Co., against Banks, and in August, 1820, recovered a judgment against him. Banks proved insolvent, and on the 8th of February, 1821, the testator caused a writ to be issued in the names of John V. Wilcox, Arthur Johnson, and Major Drinkherd, as copartners in the firm and style of John V. Wilcox & Co., against Hawkins, the indorser of the note.

This action, thus instituted and docketed as a suit by John V. Wilcox & Co. against John H. Hawkins, was, after various delays, brought to a trial in April, 1824, when the plaintiffs were nonsuited; and this nonsuit was affirmed on an appeal to the Supreme Court, at June Term, 1824.

Thereupon the present suit was instituted, viz., on the 27th of January, 1825, by John V. Wilcox and Thomas Wilcox, copartners under the firm and style of John V. Wilcox & Co., against the testator of the defendants; and on his death this suit was revived against them by scire facias.

Two breaches were assigned, in distinct counts, by the plaintiffs in their declaration:

The first, that the testator neglected to institute any suit for them against the indorser until the 9th of November, 1822, on which day the remedy against the indorser was barred by statute.

The second, that he instituted and carried on for them the suit, as hereinbefore stated, against the indorser, negligently and unskillfully; and before the same was terminated, the remedy against him was barred as aforesaid, as fully appears by the record.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on the statute of limitations. The time allowed by this statute for bringing all actions on the case, *is three years after the cause of action [174 accrues, and not afterwards.

In the Circuit Court it was contended by the defendants that on the first count of the declaration the cause of action arose from the time when the attorney ought to have sued the indorser, which was within a reasonable time after the note was received for collection; or, at all events, after the failure to collect the money from the maker; and that on the second count, his cause of action arose at the time of committing the blunder in the issuing of the writ in the names of the wrong plaintiffs.

It was contended by the plaintiffs that on the first count their cause of action accrued when the testator of the defendants suffered the remedy to be extinguished by a neglect to sue on or before the 9th of November, 1822; and on the second count, when the suit unskillfully brought and prosecuted was terminated; or, at all events, on the 9th of November, 1822.

It was agreed that if the positions taken on the part of the defendants be correct on both counts, then a judgment is to be entered for the defendants.

If those taken by the plaintiffs be correct, then a judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs on both counts; or if either of the positions thus taken by the plaintiffs be correct, then a judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs on the count, wherein the statute ought not to bar.

On which questions the judges divided in opinion, and directed the difference to be certified to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Wirt, for the plaintiff, maintained that the positions taken by the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court were correct, and that the same should be so certified to the Circuit Court by this court.

NOTE.—Agency.—That an agent or attorney is liable to the principal for negligence or unskillful conduct, see note to Bell v. Cunningham, 3 Pet., 69. Peters 4.

The action is against an attorney for negligence, by which the plaintiffs lost their debt. It is admitted that an attorney is only liable for gross negligence. (2 Starkie's Evid., 133.) In all the cases it is held that the action is not maintainable until the debt is not recoverable. (Russel v. Palmer, 2 Wilson, 328; 3 Day, 390.)

175*] *It is the loss of the debt which gives the action, and where the object of the action is to recover the whole debt from the attorney, the cause of action does not arise until the debt is lost.

If the plaintiff has sustained a special damage by the negligence of the attorney, which is short of the loss of the whole debt, he may have an action for such special damage; and the cause of action will arise from the date of the negligence which produces it. But, where the negligence is charged to be the cause of the loss of the whole debt, the cause of action does not arise until the negligence has continued so long as to produce that effect.

Thus, in this case, it was not the negligence of one or two years which produced the loss of the debt; it was not until the continuance of this negligence for three years had raised the bar of the statute of limitations in favor of the original debtor that the loss of the debt became complete, and the cause of action for the whole debt arose against the attorney.

Starkie says, in an action against an attorney for negligence, it seems that the statute runs from the time when the plaintiff was damaged, and not from the time of the negligence.

If this be law, it decides the case before the court; for the plaintiff was not damaged to the extent of the demand made by this action until his right of action was extinguished against the original debtor; that is, until the bar of the statute arose to protect that debtor. (Ballantine on Limitations, 100, 101.) Now, the universal principle is that the cause of action runs from the act or omission which produces the injury.

There are some modern cases which on their first aspect may seem to bear adversely on this action, but when examined with reference to this principle, and compared with the cause of action stated in this declaration, they will be found to proceed on a marked distinction between these cases and the case at bar.

In the case of Short v. M'Carthy (3 Barn. & Ald., 626), the attorney had neglected to examine whether certain stock the plaintiff was about to purchase stood in the name of the seller on the books of The Bank of England.

176*] He reported *that it did, and the plaintiff purchased. The court held that the cause of action arose from the time of the neglect to make the examination, and his false report that he had done so. This was a single act, by which the mischief was done.

The case of Howell v. Young. (5 Barn. & Cres., 259; 11 Eng. Com. Law Rep., 219). This is a case similar to that of Short v. M'Carthy. The attorney neglected to examine if real property was incumbered, and the statute was held to run from his neglect, which was a single act. In both those cases the injury was consummated at once by an act of negligence. And herein the cases have a strong resemblance to that of Hilson v. Boddington (11 Com. Law Rep., 223), cited by Holroyd, Justice, in Howell v. Young.

In reply to the argument for the defendant, Mr. Wirt said the question is whether, during the whole of the connection of Mr. Plummer with his clients, he had used due diligence? The distinction is between a single act of wrong and a continuing act of wrong. The first cause of action was not sufficient in itself: until its effect was fatal to the plaintiffs' interests, no suit could have been maintained. The error in the inception of the suit was a continuing cause of action.

The principle being acknowledged that an attorney is not liable but for gross negligence, and not for every negligence—for that only which produces the injury; could an action have been brought on the failure of Mr. Plummer to institute the suit properly? This would not have been permitted.

In this case, every year was a new negligence until the final loss of the plaintiffs' debt. It is suggested that the principle which in some cases makes the statute of limitations run from the time of the knowledge of the fraud or injury, will apply.

Mr. Justice Story. This principle applies only in cases of torts; and it has been expressly decided not to apply to cases of assumpsit.

Mr. Webster, for the defendant.

The question is whether the statute of limitations was not a sufficient bar to both counts in the declaration.

*To consider them separately. The [177 first count alleges that no suit was brought against the indorser until he was discharged by the Act of Limitations, which was on the 9th of November, 1822. Mr. Plummer received this note for collection on the 28th of January, 1820. He sued the drawer of the note, and had judgment in August, 1820, but obtained no satisfaction, the drawer having failed. According to the allegations on this count, he then delayed more than two years before he took any steps against the indorser. This was negligence clear and actionable. He should have used all reasonable diligence, and as soon as he intermitted that diligence, he was liable to an action for neglect. The cause of action against him is his omitting to sue the indorser so soon as he ought to have sued him; and the true question is, when did this cause of action arise?

The plaintiff contends that this cause of action arose when the indorser was discharged by lapse of time; but this cannot be maintained. Suppose there had been no statute of limitations by which an indorser would have been discharged, would not an action have lain against Mr. Plummer for not suing him? He had a reasonable time, according to the course of the courts and the practice of the country, within which to sue the indorser; and if he did not sue within such a reasonable time, he himself was subject to a suit for negligence.

He had promised to use all common diligence to collect the note. Uncommon delay was a breach of that promise and a cause of action. It is not at all material to this cause of action whether the full extent of damage was then ascertained or not ascertained. It was enough that there was a cause of action. From that moment the statute began to run. The law regards the time when the cause of action arises, not the time when the degree of injury, more or less, is made manifest; and when the cause of action is a breach of promise or neglect of duty, the right to sue arises immediately on that breach of promise or neglect of duty; and this right to sue is not suspended until subsequent events shall show the amount of damage or loss. This may be shown at the time of 178 trial; or, indeed, if it be not actually ascertained at the time of trial, the jury must still judge of the case as they can, and assess damages according to their discretion.

A rule different from this would be attended with one of two consequences—either no action could be brought in such a case until the full amount of injury was ascertained, or a fresh and substantive cause of action would arise on every new addition to the probability of loss.

The cases are clear and decisive to show that in such cases as this the cause of action arises with the original neglect. (Short v. M'Carthy, 3 Bar. & Ald., 626, 630; 3 Eng. Com. Law Rep., 403; Battley et al. v. Faulkner et al., 3 B. & A., 288; 3 Eng. Com. Law Rep., 289; Hovell v. Young, 5 B. & C., 254; 11 Eng. Com. Law Rep., 219; 2 Saunders on Pleading and Evid., 645.)

Hovell v. Young is much like this case. It was an action against an attorney for negligence where no loss actually resulted, and where the negligence itself was not discovered for some years. The court held the action accrued from the time of the breach of duty. There the action was ease; but the court looked to the real nature of the transaction, and applied the statute to it, disregarding the form of action. Holroyd, Justice, said, "the loss does not constitute a fresh ground of action, but a mere measure of damages. There is no new misconduct or negligence of the attorney, and consequently there is no new cause of action." This language is strictly applicable to the case before the court. Omitting to sue beyond a reasonable time, Mr. Plummer was guilty of negligence; a cause of action had then accrued against him; his omitting still farther to sue was no new neglect, it was no new cause of action, but merely the continued existence of the former cause.

Counsel below illustrated this rule of law very well by referring to the cause of action for defamation. If words, not in themselves actionable, be spoken, and special damage result, the party injured may sue within the time limited for such suits after the happening of the injury; because, in such case, the specific injury is the cause of action. But if words be spoken which are of themselves actionable, and 179 special damage result also, in such case, notwithstanding or not regarding the time of the happening of the special damage, the statute of limitation will run from the time of speaking the words.

It seems to have been contended for the plaintiff in the court below on this first count, that Mr. Plummer was bound to sue the indorser; that this was a continuing obligation, and that every day furnished a new fault and a new injury, till the claim on which he should have sued was extinguished. If this mode of argument be plausible, it is no more. The same reasoning would apply, and with equal force, to every case of implied promise. If one borrows money, it is his duty to pay; and he is in default every day, and commits a new injury every day until he does pay. Yet the statute runs in his favor from the day when he first ought to pay.

Mr. Plummer was bound to sue at the first court because that was reasonable time; not suing then, he was from that moment liable to an action for negligence; and supposing him not to have sued at all, as this first count charges, his fault was then complete.

But the true view of the case, no doubt, is that attempted to be raised under the second count. Mr. Plummer did sue; but he sued negligently or unskillfully. He brought a suit against the right party on the plaintiffs' note, but he misdescribed the plaintiffs. This was his error. Here was the negligence; and, therefore, here the cause of action. He might have been sued for this negligence the next day after he issued the writs; and the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover such damages as they could show, at the time of trial and on the trial, they had sustained. This original error in the attorney was a breach of duty, from which the failure in the suit resulted as a consequence. The failure in the suit was not his breach of duty; the loss of the debt was not his breach of duty. These were both but the consequences of that breach. They were its results, and they fixed the measure of damages, but were not the negligence which was alone the cause of action. It is established law that the limitation of the statute is to be referred to that act or omission which gives the cause of action, *without any regard to the consequences [180 which ascertain the amount of damages. (1 Salk., 11.)

In the view which the plaintiffs' counsel takes of this matter, it would necessarily follow that after the first term or court in which Plummer could have sued and ought to have sued, the plaintiff had a new cause of action against him every day for three years; each day's neglect being, as it is said, a new default or new cause of action. If each day's neglect be a new default and new cause of action, it is quite clear that the pendency of a suit for yesterday's default would be no bar to a suit founded on a default of today; and if these causes of action be, as is contended they are, all new, independent and distinct, then it follows that independent and distinct damages may be given in each. Arguments can be no more than specious which lead to results like these.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States in North Carolina, to recover of the defendants the amount of a loss sustained by reason of the neglect or unskillful conduct of their testator, while acting in the character of an attorney-at-law.

A promissory note was placed in his hands for collection by the plaintiffs. He instituted a suit in the State court thereon against Banks, the drawer, on the 7th of February, 1820, but neglected to do so against Hawkins, the indorser. Banks proved insolvent; and then, to wit, on the 8th of February, 1821, he issued a writ against the indorser, but committed a fatal misnomer of the plaintiffs, upon which, after passing through the successive courts of the State, a judgment of nonsuit was finally rendered against them. Before that time the action against the indorser was barred by limitation, to wit, on the 9th of November, 1822, and this suit was instituted on the 27th of January, 1825.

The form of the action is assumpsit; and the plea now to be considered is the act of limitation, which in that State creates a bar to that action in three years.

The case is presented in a very anomalous form; but in order to subject it to any known 181 class of rules, we must consider *it as coming up upon opposite bills of exceptions, craving instructions, on which the court divided. This court can only certify an opinion on the points so raised; that part of the agreement stated in the record which relates to the rendering of judgment on the one side or on the other, must have its operation in the court below.

There were two counts in the declaration: the one laying the breach in not suing at all until the note became barred, thus treating as a mere nullity the suit in which the blunder was committed, and the other laying the breach in the commission of the blunder; but both placing the damages upon the barring of the note by the Act of Limitation. As this event happened on the 22d November, 1822, this suit is in time if the statute commenced running only from the happening of the damage. But if it commenced running either when the suit was commenced against the drawer or a reasonable time after, or at the time of Bank's insolvency, or at the time when the blunder was committed; in any one of those events the three years had run out. And thus the only question in the case is whether the statute runs from the time the action accrued, or from the time that the damage is developed or becomes definite.

And this we hardly feel at liberty to treat as an open question.

It is not a case of consequential damages, in the technical acceptance of those terms, such as the case of Gillon v. Boddington (1 B. & P., 541), in which the digging near the plaintiff's foundation was the cause of the injury; for in that instance no right or contract was violated, and by possibility the act might have proved harmless, as it would have been had the wall never fallen. Nor is it analogous to the case of a nuisance; since the nuisance of to-day is a substantive cause of action, and not the same with the nuisance of yesterday, any more than an assault and battery.

The ground of action here is a contract to act diligently and skillfully, and both the contract and the breach of it admit of a definite assignment of date. When might this action have been instituted? is the question, for from that time the statute must run.

182* *When the attorney was chargeable with negligence or unskillfulness his contract was violated, and the action might have been sustained immediately. Perhaps, in that event, no more than nominal damages may be proved and no more recovered; but, on the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the proof of actual damage may extend to facts that occur and grow out of the injury, even up to the day of the verdict. If so, it is clear the damage is not the cause of action.

This is fully illustrated by the case from Salkeld and Modern, in which a plaintiff having previously recovered for an assault, afterwards sought indemnity for a very serious effect of the assault which could not have been anticipated, and of consequence could not have been compensated in making up the verdict.

The cases are numerous and conclusive on this doctrine. As long ago as the 20th Eliz., 1 Croke, 53, this was one of the points ruled in The Sheriff's of Norwich v. Bradshaw. And the case was a strong one; for it was altogether problematical whether the plaintiffs ever should sustain any damages from the injury. The principle has often been applied to the very plea here set up, and in some very modern cases. That of Battley v. Faulkner (3 B. & A., 288) was exactly this case; for there the damage depended upon the issue of another suit, and could not be assessed by a jury until the final result of that suit was definitely known. Yet it was held that the plaintiff should have instituted his action, and he was barred for not doing so. In the case of Short v. McCarthy, which was assumpsit against an attorney for neglect of duty, the plea of the statute was sustained though the proof established that it was unknown to the plaintiff until the time had run out. And the same point is ruled in Granger v. George (5 B. & C., 149.) In both cases the court intimating that if suppressed by fraud it ought to be replied to the plea, if the party could avail himself of it. In Howell v. Young the same doctrine is affirmed, and the statute held to run from the time of the injury, that being the cause of the action, and not from the time of damage or discovery of the injury.

The opinion of this court will have to be certified in the *language of the defend- [183 ants' supposed bill of exceptions, to wit, "that on the first count in the declaration the cause of the action arose at the time when the attorney ought to have sued the indorser, which was within a reasonable time after the note was received for collection, or at all events, after the failure to collect the money from the maker. And that on the second count his cause of action arose at the time of committing the blunder in issuing the writ in the names of wrong plaintiffs."

This case came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of North Carolina, and on the points and questions on which the judges of the said Circuit Court were opposed in opinion, and which were certified to this court for its opinion in pursuance of the Act of Congress in such case made and provided, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court, that it be certified to the said Circuit Court of the United States for the District of North Carolina, "that on the first count in the declaration the cause of action arose at the time when the attorney ought to have sued the indorser, which was within a reasonable time after the note was received for collection, or, at all events, at the failure to collect the money from the maker; and that on the second count his cause of action arose at the time of committing the blunder in issuing the writ in the names of wrong plaintiffs; all of which is accordingly hereby certified to the said Circuit Court of the United States for the District of North Carolina.

*ADAM BARTLE

v.

WILLIAM D. NUTT, Administrator of
GEORGE COLEMAN.

Corruption of Public officers—contract void as against public morals.

A contract was made for rebuilding Fort Washington, by M., a public agent, and a deputy quartermaster-general, with B.; in the profits of which M. was to participate. False measures of the work were attempted to be imposed on the government, the success of which was prevented by the vigilance of the accounting officers of the treasury. A bill was filed to compel an alleged partner in the contract to account for and pay to one of the partners in the transaction one-half of the loss sustained in the execution of the contract.

Held, that to state such a case was to decide it. Public morals, public justice, and the well-established principles of all judicial tribunals, alike forbid the interposition of courts of justice to lend their aid to purposes like this. To enforce a contract which began with the corruption of a public officer and progressed in the practice of known willful deception in its execution, can never be approved or sanctioned by any court.

The law leaves the parties to such a contract as it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply practiced fraud. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself, by an exertion of its powers to shift the loss from one to the other, or to equalize the benefits or burdens which may have resulted from the violation of every principle of morals and of law.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court of the County of Alexandria in the District of Columbia. The appellant was complainant in that court.

The case was argued by Mr. Swann and Mr. Jones for the appellant, and by Mr. Taylor for the appellee.

Mr. Justice BALDWIN delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought on the chancery side of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Alexandria by the appellant (complainant) against the appellee (respondent). The object professed is to obtain a settlement of accounts arising out of a partnership charged to have existed between the complainant and respondent and one Ferdinand Marsteller.

The bill charges that in 1814 a contract was entered into between the complainant and the government of the United States for rebuilding Fort Washington.

*That when the contract was made it [*185 was agreed between the respondent, Ferdinand Marsteller, and the complainant, that they should share the profits of the contract—that is, that each of them should receive one-third part of the profits. That the respondent was to furnish the concern with such merchandise as might be necessary, disburse the funds of the concern, and keep the accounts relative to such disbursements; that the complainant was to superintend the work, and Marsteller to drawing and furnishing the money for carrying it on.

The bill charges that under this arrangement the work was commenced and finished, and that on its measurement it was supposed a profit had been made of about four thousand five hundred dollars; and that, accordingly, one thousand five hundred dollars were advanced to the respondent as his share of the profits.

That about the close of the business it was discovered that Marsteller had committed great frauds on the government, and that the complainant gave information of these frauds to the Department of War, in consequence of which Marsteller was disgraced and soon after died insolvent.

That soon after this development the respondent instituted suit against the complainant for a balance claimed on his store account, and for money disbursed by him for complainant. That the complainant instituted a cross action against the respondent; and both suits were, by mutual consent, referred to arbitrators.

NOTE.—Contracts void as against public policy, or as illegal.

Contracts for general services in procuring legislation are void, from public policy, and it is the duty of the court so to declare. Weed v. Black, 2 MacArthur, 268.

But contracts which provide compensation in consideration of particular service to be rendered, such as collection of evidence, the preparation of papers, or the delivery of arguments in support of a claim, are legitimate everywhere. Ibid.

A contract for a contingent fee for the collection of a claim against the United States, which is otherwise fair upon its face, is not in violation of public policy. Burbridge v. Fackler, 2 MacArthur, 407.

A contract between a government claimant and a claim agent employing the services of the agent in obtaining the passage of a private Act of Congress for payment of the claim which clearly contemplates paying the agent for personal solicitations of members of Congress and other services such as are known as "lobbying" is void, because contrary to public policy. Trist v. Child, 21 Wall., 441.

An agreement to make compensation for purely professional services in obtaining the passage of a law, such as drafting the petition to set forth the claim, attending to the taking of testimony, collecting facts, preparing arguments, and submitting them, orally or in writing, to a committee or other proper authority, and other services of like character, is valid. So, a contract to pay the expenses of procuring passage of a law, is not necessarily illegal. Trist v. Child, 21 Wall., 441; Bohm v. Goldstein, 53 N. Y., 634.

Where, in the contract, stipulations to pay for professional services and for lobby services are blended and confused, the whole contract is void. Where the stipulation to pay for services of the latter character exists, it effects fatally, in all its parts, the entire body of the contract. Ibid.

A contract providing a compensation for obtaining legislation, or to prevent legislative investigation into the affairs of a railway corporation is void. Usher v. McBratney, 3 Dill., 385.

An agreement to pay a contingent compensation for professional services of a legitimate character, is prosecuting a claim against the United States pending in one of the executive departments, is not in violation of law or public policy. Stanton v. Embrey, 3 Otto, 93; U. S., 548.

A promise to an officer in consideration of forbearance to prosecute, is void as against public policy. Keir v. Leeman, 9 Adol. & Ell., 371.

So an agreement to use one's influence with the common council of New York, to procure a lease, was held void as against public policy. Wall v. Charlick, N. Y. Leg. Obs., July, 1850, p. 230.

That when the reference was made, the complainant expected that the arbitrators would go into a full examination of the partnership accounts in relation to the government contract, as well as in relation to the individual accounts of the parties. But that when the arbitrators proceeded to act, they declined looking on the transaction as a partnership one, and thought themselves bound to consider the accounts as unconnected with that concern, and finally awarded against the complainant four thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and forty-two cents, in which was included an allowance of one thousand five hundred dollars for Coleman's share of the profits of the con-186* tract, and one *thousand five hundred and thirty-four dollars for commissions in disbursing the money received from the government.

That the copartnership has been always indebted to the complainant on account of the contract with government.

The bill then proceeds to some details respecting the accounts, at this time not important, and prays for an account and general relief.

The answer admits that the complainant in 1814 entered into a contract with Ferdinand Marsteller, agent for the United States, for the rebuilding of Fort Washington, with the terms and conditions of which contract the respondent had no concern.

That it being necessary to have an agent in Alexandria to procure supplies for carrying the contract into effect, and as Marsteller had expressed a wish that the money should be disbursed through the agency of the respondent, and that the respondent should keep the accounts between Marsteller and the complainant, the latter agreed that the respondent should act as agent, and in the first instance offered him as a compensation a share of the profits, and the complainant afterwards offered him a commission of five per cent. on the disbursements. That the respondent accepted of the latter offer, and under it entered on the agency, after having refused the first.

The respondent denies that he was in any shape interested as a copartner with the complainant and Marsteller, or with either of them, in relation to the said contract, or that he ever received any share of the profits; but admits the charge of a commission of five per cent. on the money disbursed by him.

He admits that the complainant having refused to pay the balance due from him to the respondent on private account, he did institute suit against him. That a cross suit was brought by the complainant against the respondent. That both suits were referred to arbitrators, who awarded in the respondent's favor the sum of four thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and forty-two cents. That on the investigation before the arbitrators, the complainant set up as an offset the same claim which he prosecutes in this suit, and that it was rejected as unsupported by evidence.

*The respondent relies on that award, [187 and the judgment on it, as a bar to further proceedings.

The cause came on to be heard on the bill and answer, and after various proceedings, not necessary to notice, the bill was dismissed without costs; the court being of opinion that the partnership charged was contrary to public policy and sound morals, and that a court of equity ought not to lend its aid to either of the parties against the other.

Among the exhibits in the cause was the contract between the complainant and the government, dated 17th September, 1814, signed and sealed by complainant, and witnessed by Thomas Lowe.

"Accepted for the United States by order of Colonel Monroc, Secretary of War, September 30th, 1814."

F. MARSTELLER,
Deputy Quartermaster-General."

The proposition for this contract was addressed by Bartle to Marsteller in writing, and the contract was signed on the same day.

From the evidence taken in the case it clearly appears that Marsteller acted as the agent of the United States in making the contract. That the materials furnished and the labor performed were under the direction of Bartle. That

The following contracts have been set aside, as against public policy. (1) Marriage brokerage contracts, by which a party engages to give another compensation, if he will negotiate an advantageous match for him. the money was principally received from the government by Marsteller, paid over by him to Coleman, who disbursed it on the orders of Bartle. There can be no doubt that Bartle and Marsteller were partners in the profits of the contract; but the capacity in which Coleman acted does not seem to be so certain. There is very strong evidence of his being a partner; but it is not very material whether he was an agent or a party in a contract made and carried into effect under the circumstances which attended this. The shades of difference which would in either event distinguish the moral or legal aspect of the cause, are too slight to engage the attention of the court.

By the account of the complainant against the firm of Marsteller, Coleman & Bartle, it appears that his charges amount to fifty-eight thousand three hundred and seventy-four dollars, and that there is a loss to the concern of 188 ten *thousand five hundred and thirty-eight dollars, one-half of which he charges to Coleman; and he seeks to recover this by deducting the amount from a judgment obtained against him by Coleman in the Circuit Court, affirmed here on a writ of error.

Of the alleged loss on this contract, the sum of eight thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars is thus accounted for in the complainant's account against the firm.

"To deductions made by the government (which are against the operative mechanic) from the work and materials, vide abstracts B. F., eight thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars of this sum." Of this sum it appears by abstract B. that three thousand one hundred and ninety-eight dollars were for an overcharge of fifty cents per perch of stone, and fifty cents per thousand of bricks, beyond the contract price; and by abstract F., that five thousand six hundred and sixty-one dollars were for over measurement of stone, brick and carpenter work; so that deducting these two items from the amount of the loss on the contract, it is reduced to one thousand six hundred and seventy-eight dollars.

The case, then, presented for the consideration of the Circuit Court, and now before us for revision, is this: a contract made by the complainant with a public agent, a deputy quartermaster-general, to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars, in the profits of which he was to participate; false measures attempted to be imposed on the government; the fraud discovered by the vigilance of its accounting officers; and a bill in equity filed to compel an alleged partner to account for, and pay to one of the parties in such a transaction, the one-half of a loss sustained by an unsuccessful attempt to impose spurious vouchers on the government.

To state such a case is to decide it. Public morals, public justice, and the well-established principles of all judicial tribunals, alike forbid the interposition of courts of justice to lend their aid to purposes like this. To enforce a contract which began with the corruption of a public officer, and progressed in the practice of known and willful deception in its execution, can never be consummated or sanctioned by any court.

*The law leaves the parties to such a [189 contract as it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, it is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply practiced fraud; which, when detected, deprives him of anticipated profits, or subjects him to unexpected losses. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself by an exertion of its powers by shifting the loss from the one to the other; or to equalize the benefits or burdens which may have resulted by the violation of every principle of morals and of laws.

This court is unanimously of opinion that the Circuit Court were right in dismissing the complainant's bill, and affirms their decree with costs.

JOHN TAGGART AND MARY, HIS WIFE,
ET AL.

Equity—bill to compel execution of securities for money loaned—necessary parties—breach of trust in a father, protection of infant children against.

Where a bill was filed to compel the execution of securities for money loaned, which securities, it was alleged in the bill, were promised to be given upon particular real estate purchased by the money loaned, and the complainants had omitted to make the prior mortgagees of the premises on which the securities were required to be given, parties to the bill, the court said: It has been urged in reply to those grounds of reversal for want of parties or for want of due maturation for a final hearing, that nothing is ordered to be mortgaged or sold besides the interest of the party who is ordered to execute the mortgage, or whose interest is to be sold, whatever that may be. But this we conceive to be an insufficient answer. It is not enough that a court of equity causes nothing but the interest of the proper party to change owners. Its decree should terminate and not instigate litigation. Its sales should tempt men to sober investment, and not to wild speculation. Its process should act upon known and definite interests, and not upon such as admit of no medium of estimation. It has means of reducing every right to certainty and precision, and is therefore bound to employ these means in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

The general rule is, "that however numerous the persons interested in the subject of a suit, they must all be made parties, plaintiff or defendant, in order that a complete decree may be made; it being the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by embracing the whole subjects, deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit; to make the performance of the order perfectly safe to those who have to obey it, and to prevent future litigation.

Where in the course of proceedings in a suit in chancery in the Circuit Court it is apparent that the father has not presented the interests of his children for protection, the court said: Although there is no appeal taken in behalf of the children, the court, while interfering to prevent the breach of a trust in behalf of the father, can hardly be expected to pass over without noticing an omission in the father, amounting to a breach of trust, to the prejudice of his infant children. APPEAL from the District Court of the Western District of Virginia.

The appellees, who are citizens of Maryland, filed their bill in the Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia, in which the material allegations set forth are, that on the 22d of June, 1809, Grizzle Taggart, mother of John Taggart, conveyed to William Copeland Goldsmith and James Caldwell, all her estate for the uses and purposes 191*] *mentioned in the deed exhibited with the bill. A part of the estate so conveyed consisted of a debt due to the said Grizzle from Keller & Foreman of Baltimore, which was secured by a mortgage on valuable real property called the Salisbury Mills.

That about the year 1817, Caldwell, who was the nephew of Grizzle, importuned her and her son John and his wife, to consent to permit him to receive the money due on the mortgage, and to use it in the purchase of an estate called the White Sulphur Springs, situate in Greenbrier County, Virginia, and which belonged to the heirs of Michael Bowyer; and to induce them to yield their assent he represented that estate to be very valuable, and promised that he would encumber it (when purchased) by a mortgage to secure the money which he should receive from Keller & Foreman.

The complainants further state that consent was accordingly yielded on the conditions proposed, in consequence of which Caldwell (who was then sole trustee, the other being dead) received from Keller & Foreman the sum of fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars and seventy cents in discharge of their mortgage, which he appropriated to the purchase of several shares of the copartners of the said Michael Bowyer in the said estate, or paid therewith for some shares previously purchased.

Some time afterwards, as the complainants further allege, in order to satisfy Grizzle Taggart of the propriety of his purchase, and that the security promised would be ample, Caldwell brought her from her residence in Baltimore to the White Sulphur Springs. That she returned about the beginning of October, 1817, well pleased with the property; that Caldwell promised to execute the mortgage immediately after her return, but that in a very short time Grizzle departed this life without it having been done.

A few days after this event, Caldwell, secretly and unknown to the complainants, as they state, executed a mortgage in favor of Jeremiah Sullivan and others, on his interest in the White Sulphur Springs estate, to secure the sum of twenty thousand dollars. A second mortgage, to *secure the same [*192 debt, was executed by Caldwell, bearing date the 15th of September, 1819, and both were duly recorded (and are in the record). It is stated that some defect unknown to the complainants was supposed to exist in the mortgage of the 24th of October, 1817, which was the reason for the second being executed.

After the death of Grizzle Taggart, her son, John Taggart, as the complainants state, applied to Caldwell to execute the mortgage which he had promised on the White Sulphur Spring estate. He then informed the said John, that he had executed the mortgage of the 24th of October, 1817, before mentioned, on which the said John upbraided him with his breach of trust. Caldwell then promised to extinguish the incumbrance out of the annual profits of the estate, and to make provision for the debt created as before mentioned. Nothing, however, was done; the complainants being without any written evidence of their claim until the 9th of September, 1823, when Caldwell executed a paper, exhibited with the bill, acknowledging the sum of fifteen thousand two hundred and sixty dollars and seventy cents to be due on account of principal, and two thousand nine hundred dollars on account of interest.

NOTE.—As to necessary parties to suits in equity, see note to Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat., 290; and note to Marshall v. Beverly, 5 Wheat., 313.

The bill further states that the mortgagees, Jeremiah Sullivan and others, instituted a suit to foreclose the equity of redemption; but before the case was brought to a hearing, a certain Richard Singleton purchased the mortgage and obtained a transfer thereof; that to secure the money paid for the mortgage and other money advanced, he obtained a deed of trust from Caldwell on his interest in the estate, that is, four-sevenths obtained by purchase, and one seventh in right of his wife, who is a daughter of Michael Bowyer.

The complainants further state that the profits of the said estate are great, but that such is the imprudence of Caldwell that he has never paid any part of the principal or interest on the mortgage, either before or since Singleton acquired it; that he is incurring other large debts, and that he has no other means to pay the money due to them except his interest in the White Sulphur Spring estate. They insist that they hold an equitable 193 lien on that estate so far *as Caldwell's interest extends, and they pray that it may be subjected to their debt; that another trustee may be appointed to execute the trust created by the deed of the 22d of June, 1809, and for general relief.

To this bill James Caldwell and his wife filed a joint answer, sworn to on the 30th of September, 1827, the material statements of which are the following:

He admits the execution of the deed of the 22d of June, 1809, though he states that he was not apprised of its existence until after it was recorded. He admits that he received from Keller & Foreman the sum of fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars and seventy cents, due to Grizzle Taggart, and embraced in the deed executed by her; but he alleges that he was her debtor to that amount, and that to secure the debt he had given a deed of trust to Nicholas Brice, as trustee. That at his request, Grizzle and her son John consented to release his deed of trust, so as to enable him, Caldwell, to sell the property (Salisbury Plains) to Keller & Foreman, which was accordingly done, and he received the money. That the release exhibited with the answer was executed by Nicholas Brice, Grizzle Taggart, John Taggart and Mary his wife, when he was not present.

He alleges that Brice agreed, on his behalf, without consulting him, that the debt due from him to the said Grizzle, or a part thereof, should be vested in bank stock, and that the agreement and instrument of writing mentioned in the release contemplated that object; that he never executed any such writing, though he was informed before the delivery of the release of the proposition to invest the money due from him in bank stock, and refused to accept it on that condition, of which the parties interested were informed; but that the release was afterwards, by their consent, or without objection from them, delivered. That he was unwilling to accept the release on the condition proposed, because his object in desiring it was the use of the money.

He alleges that the money which he obtained from Keller & Foreman was applied to the payment of his debts, and not to the purchase of the White Sulphur Springs, or any interest therein, or anything due therefor.

*He denies that it was his object to [*194] invest the money obtained by him in the White Sulphur Spring property, or that he obtained the release by any such representation, or by any promise to give an incumbrance thereon. That he acquired the White Sulphur Spring property with other funds, and never contemplated securing the debt due to Grizzle Taggart on that property; but expected to pay it out of a large debt due to him from another person, which he failed to realize.

He admits that Grizzle Taggart visited the White Sulphur Springs; that he returned with her in 1817; but denies that she was brought there with the views mentioned in the bill. He says he does not recollect, and has no reason to believe that a single word passed between him and her in relation to his giving a mortgage or other lien on that property, either during the said visit, or at any other time.

Caldwell denies that there was any stipulation between him and John Taggart and Mary his wife, or either of them, that the debt should be secured by a mortgage on the White Sulphur Spring property. He states that he does not recollect that the said John ever upbraided him with a breach of trust. He admits that he had a conversation with John in 1819 upon the subject of his giving the mortgage to secure other persons, and that John Taggart then said, that he ought, in the first place, to have secured the debt in which he was interested. In reply to which, he stated that he was willing to secure that debt by a lien on the property, as soon as the other was extinguished, which he supposed he would be able to do after the lapse of some time. Previous to this, Caldwell states that he has no recollection of having conversed with John Taggart on the subject of giving a lien, though the fact of his having executed the other mortgage was known to John as early as 1817.

He states that he does not believe that John Taggart ever thought that he had deceived him. That there was no privacy in giving the mortgages of the 24th of October, 1817, and 15th of September, 1819, which he admits he executed to secure the same debt. As evidence to show that *John did not believe he had been [*195] deceived, he exhibits a letter from him, which is in the record.

He admits the execution of the paper exhibited with the complainants' bill, bearing date the 9th of September, 1823; the pendency of a bill to foreclose the equity of redemption on the mortgage of the 15th of September, 1819; the subsequent purchase of Richard Singleton, and the execution of a deed of trust for his benefit, as stated in the bill.

James Caldwell then proceeds to state in his answer the interest which he has in the White Sulphur Spring property. 1. That his wife is entitled to one-seventh, as one of the heirs of Michael Boyer. 2. That she is entitled to another seventh by virtue of a conveyance made to her by her brother, John Bowyer. 3. He claims one-seventh by purchase from William Bowyer, to whom he paid only one hundred dollars of the purchase money. The contract is referred to, and filed among the papers of this court. He states that William Bowyer is dead, having made a will which is exhibited and copied into the record. 4. He claims another seventh by purchase from William Bedford, who is stated to have purchased the interest of Thomas Bowyer, a son of Michael. That for this interest he stands indebted six thousand dollars, with interest, for which a deed of trust was executed on the property purchased, a copy of which is exhibited; and a suit has been brought to enforce this lien. 5. He claims the interest of James Bowyer, another son of the said Michael. The remaining two shares, he states, are in Frances Bedford and Elizabeth Copeland, daughters of Michael Bowyer.

Caldwell insists that if, contrary to his expectation, the complainants should establish a specific lien on any part of the said property, that it can only extend to such interests as he owned when such lien originated; and that it ought not to be extended to defeat the rights of others, or their equitable lien for purchase money due to them from him; and he requires that their rights shall be precisely ascertained and adjusted, before any effort shall be made to enforce such lien in favor of the complainants, and that partition shall be made according to the rights of the parties.

196* Caldwell further states that an indenture was executed by him and his wife and the other persons interested by which it was agreed that all the lands and tenements of which Michael Bowyer died seized should be divided between the parties by commissioners chosen for that purpose, except two hundred acres, including the White Sulphur Springs, buildings, &c., which should be held in common; that this partition has never been made. He insists that if the complainants should establish the lien demanded by them, that partition should be made according to said agreement, and his part in the two hundred acres first subjected.

He admits that the White Sulphur Spring estate is valuable, but regrets that the profits are not as great as estimated by the complainants. He deems it unnecessary and irrelevant to exhibit a schedule of his receipts and expenditures, or an account of his management and history of his domestic affairs. He states that he is desirous of paying all the debts which he owes, and particularly that claimed in this case, the justice of which he has never denied; that he trusts an apology will be found for not having effected that sooner, in the embarrassed situation of his affairs. Such was the condition of the White Sulphur Spring property when he obtained possession, that he has been compelled to incur many expenditures to make it at all productive. He has well-founded hopes that if he is suffered to continue his exertions, that in a few years he will be able to do full justice to all the world; but that the interests of his creditors require that he should not be destroyed by an unmerciful pressure of their demands.

Caldwell objects to the measure of relief sought by the complainants as not being warranted by the laws of the land, the principles of equity, or the dictates of justice. So far as they set up any pretended parol agreement, he insists that it is within the operation of the statute of frauds and perjuries, of which he prays the benefit, as if it had been specially pleaded.

Caldwell moreover states that he feels it his duty to protect the trust fund committed to his care from any appropriation not contemplated by the donor. He denies the right of the complainants to take that fund *from the control [197 of the trustees, or to exhaust or expend the principal; and says that the interest, or profits only, can be applied to the use of the cestuis que trust.

The defendant, the wife of James Caldwell, states that her interests in the White Sulphur Spring property are, in some respects, different from those of her husband; and that she is advised that no agreement made by him, in which she has not concurred in the form prescribed by law, affects her rights, derived by descent, devise, or conveyance. She refers to a copy of the deed (which is not in the record) executed by her brother John Bowyer, to show that she is entitled to the sole and exclusive use and benefit of his share. As to the interest of her deceased brother, William Bowyer, she contends that she is entitled to the same, or the purchase money thereof, during her life, in the same exclusive and separate manner; and that after her death the property passes to her children and nephew. She refers to the agreement between her husband and the said William Bowyer to show that the latter had the privilege to revoke the contract if the purchase money should not be paid; which privilege she says passed to her by the will of the said William, which privilege she claims to exercise, so far as the same may be necessary for her complete protection. She prays that she may be permitted to answer separately, or that her rights may be investigated and decided, as if she had done so. She says she has no knowledge of the justice of the debt claimed and how it originated.

Depositions were taken in the District Court establishing certain facts which are sufficiently referred to in the opinion of this court, and when the cause came on to a hearing the court made the following decree:

This cause came on to be heard on the bill, answers, exhibits, and examination of witnesses, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, and for reasons set forth in a written opinion filed among the papers in this cause, it is adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the defendant, James Caldwell, do forthwith execute a proper deed of mortgage to Silas H. Smith, who is hereby appointed trustee for that purpose, providing for the annual payment to *the said trustee of the legal interest on [198 the sum of fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars and seventy cents, the amount of the sum withdrawn by the said defendant from the trust fund, to commence this day; to be paid by the said trustee to John Taggart during his life, and on his death that the principal, with any interest that may accrue after the death of the said John, to be paid to the children of said John, and Mary his wife, according to the provisions of the deed executed by Grizzle Taggart on the 22d of June, 1809, and filed among the papers in this cause. And it is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the said defendant pay unto the plaintiff, John Taggart, the sum of seven thousand five hundred and thirteen dollars and forty cents, being the amount of interest now due on the said sum of fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars and seventy cents; and in case the said defendant shall make default in the payment of the said sum of money, so that the same or any part thereof shall remain due and unpaid on the 5th of August next, then it shall be the duty of the marshal of this court to proceed to sell all the right, title and interest which the defendant may have in the White Sulphur Spring estate, in the County of Greenbrier, for ready money; having first advertised the time and place of sale, in some newspaper published in Richmond, Staunton, and Lewisburg, for thirty days before such sale, and that he report his proceedings to this court. And it is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the said defendant pay unto the plaintiffs their costs expended in the prosecution of this suit.

From this decree the said James Caldwell prayed and obtained an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The case was argued by Mr. Wirt for the appellant, and by Mr. Sheffy for the appellees.

Mr. Wirt contended, 1. That the necessary and proper parties had not been called before the District Court when the decree was pronounced.

2. That as to those who had been called before the court, the cause had not been matured for a decree when the same was pronounced.

199*] *3. That the decree is inconsistent with the relief prayed for by the bill.

4. That the decree was not justified by the evidence in the cause.

5. That even if such a decree could have been justified by the general evidence, it would only have been after the prior liens on the property had been marshaled by the report of a master commissioner, and the remaining interest of Caldwell in the property precisely ascertained and fixed by the decree.

Mr. Sheffy, for the appellees, argued that there is no error in the decree injurious to the rights of the appellant.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts of this case may be thus stated:

Grizzle Taggart, wishing to make provision for the family of her son, John Taggart, conveyed a considerable property to one Goldsmith, and the defendant, James Caldwell, to the use of herself for life, then to the joint use of John Taggart and his wife for life, to the use of the survivor for life, and finally, to be distributed among their children. The children, together with their parents, preferred this bill. The deed bears date the 22d of June, 1809, and contains a clause empowering John and his wife, or the survivor of them, to sell and dispose of the trust property, "and invest it in other property subject to the like uses and trusts, and to repeat the same as often as they may think beneficial for them and their children.

In July, 1812, Goldsmith being dead, Caldwell prevailed upon the cestuis que trust, Taggart and wife, to permit him to make use of a large sum of money raised upon the trust property, and secured it to them by a mortgage on the Salisbury Mills, executed to Nicholas Brice, in terms adapted to the purposes of the original trust deed. Afterwards, in the year 1816, Caldwell prevailed upon the cestuis que trust to make another change of application of the trust found in his favor by executing a release of the mortgage to enable him, as is alleged in the bill, to make a purchase of the Sul- [*200 phur Springs in Virginia, and under a promise to mortgage that property when purchased to secure the money according to the original trusts.

These facts make out the complainants' case, and excepting the three allegations—that the last loan was solicited for a specific purpose, that it was applied to that purpose, and under a promise that the property when purchased should be mortgaged to secure the loan according to the trusts—the answer admits the facts set out in the bill. It is, then, a clear case for relief; since the defendant Caldwell, uniting in himself the two characters of trustee and debtor to the trust fund, was guilty of a clear breach of trust in availing himself of the release of 1816 without seeing the debt well secured, agreeably to the deed of 1809. He must in any event be decreed to substitute such security as he ought to have taken upon any other change of investment effected in pursuance of the original trust. But the complainants here go for specific relief, claiming to stand in the relation of cestuis que trust or mortgagees of a specified property; upon the ground, as to the first relation, of having paid the consideration money, and as to the second, of having surrendered their existing mortgage upon Caldwell's promise to execute that in contemplation; and in one or the other or both those rights, to have the property placed in the hands of a receiver, that the income may be applied to extinguish prior incumbrances and leave the property free to satisfy this claim. The bill also contains the prayer for general relief, but the specific claim must first be disposed of before the general prayer can be considered.

The court below sustained the allegations of the bill relative to the promise to mortgage the specific property, and decreed Caldwell to execute a mortgage accordingly, to secure the principal sum of fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars. It then goes on to order the interest calculated to the date of the decree, amounting to seven thousand five hundred dollars, to be paid by a day prescribed, or in default thereof, that the property so ordered to be mortgaged to secure the principal, shall be sold to raise the interest. We think it clear that there is an error in this, since the [*201 interests of those in remainder would thus be sacrificed to the first taker. And although there is no appeal taken in their behalf, yet the court, while interfering to prevent the breach of a trust in behalf of the father, can hardly be expected to pass over without noticing an omission in the father, amounting to a breach of trust, to the prejudice of his infant children.

In an instance, therefore, in which a decree so obviously needs reforming, it is without reluctance that the court lays hold of such legal grounds for reversing it as may be considered under the appeal taken by the defendant.

The complainants in their bill set out that soon after receiving and using the release before mentioned, Caldwell purchased the five-sevenths of the interest in the Sulphur Springs, and shortly after mortgaged the same to Sullivan and others to secure certain large sums which they had assumed for him; that this mortgage was foreclosed according to the laws of Virginia, and finally lifted and assigned to Mr. Richard Singleton, who advanced thereon for the relief of Caldwell twenty-three thousand dollars, to secure which the latter executed a trust deed to A. Stevenson and F. Bowyer, which it appears became absolute by failure of payment more than a year since.

And when the defendant, Caldwell, as well as Frances Bedford, come to answer to the allegations of the purchaser of the property in question, we find that, although Caldwell has repeatedly executed deeds conveying or incumbering five-sevenths of the whole, he does not pretend to make title to more than one-seventh, to wit: the share of James Bowyer. The rest are either vested in his wife or his children, or incumbered with prior liens, which will probably sweep the whole.

His answer also introduces into the cause a deed of partition, or one partaking of that character, executed by the parties interested in this property, bearing date in 1810, by which a division or distribution has been agreed upon adapted to the nature of the property, and in which every individual has so distinct an interest that it may well be questioned whether, until it is in some way carried into execution, it 202 will be possible for any purchaser to know what he is buying. This deed has not been copied into the record sent up, but it is presumed that it could hardly have been passed over in the court below.

Of the interests thus introduced into the cause by the answer, that of the children of Thomas Bowyer, as set out in Mrs. Bedford's answer, and that of the children of Mrs. Caldwell and Mrs. Copeland, as shown by the will of William Bowyer, are wholly unrepresented.

And as to the interest of Mrs. Copeland or her representatives, although there was an order for a decree nisi, the decree nowhere appears to have been entered, nor evidence of the service or return of the rule exhibited in the record.

In reply to all these grounds of reversal, for want of parties, or for want of due maturation for a final hearing, it has been urged that nothing is ordered to be mortgaged or sold beside Caldwell's own interest, whatever that may be. But this we conceive to be an insufficient answer. It is not enough that a court of equity causes nothing but the interest of the proper party to change owners. Its decrees should terminate and not instigate litigation. Its sales should tempt men to sober investment, and not to wild speculation. Its process should act upon known and definite interests, and not upon such as admit of no medium of estimation. It has the means of reducing every right to certainty and precision, and is therefore bound to employ those means in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

There is no want of learning in the books on this subject. The general rule is laid down thus: "However numerous the persons interested in the subject of a suit, they must all be made parties plaintiffs or defendants, in order that a complete decree may be made; it being the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice by embracing the whole subject, deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of a suit to make the performance of the order perfectly safe to those who have to obey it, and to prevent future litigation." And again, "all persons are to be made parties who are legally or beneficially interested in the subject-matter and result of the *suit," extending in most 203 cases to heirs-at-law, trustees and executors.

Thus, in a case in which a remainderman in tail brought a bill against the tenant for life to have the title deeds brought into court, and there were annuitants on the reversion, and a child interested under a trust term of years prior to the limitation to the plaintiff—that is, incumbrances prior and posterior to the plaintiff—Lord Hardwicke (3 Atk., 570) refused a decree without first making them parties. So, where husband tenant for life, remainder to his wife for life, remainder over, brought his bill without joining the wife, the objection was made and sustained on the ground that if there was a decree against the husband, it would not bind the wife. (1 Atk., 289.)

So, if an under mortgagee brings his bill to foreclose the original mortgagee, he must make the first mortgagee a party. (3 P. W., 643.) This is the relation in which the complainants here seek to place themselves in reference to Mr. Singleton.

And there are various cases in which, though the heir-at-law is not a necessary party, he is made such in practice, and the reason assigned is to free the estate from every blame that may lessen its value at the sale. (2 Ves., 431; 3 P. W., 91; 3 Br. Ch. Rep., 229, 365.)

And so in cases of indefinite or blended interests, all the participators are necessary parties; as where a residue is devised to several, or even devised by specified shares.

It is clear, then, that this cause must go back as well to have the necessary parties made as to have the decree reformed and reduced to legal precision.

It is true this course might have been avoided if this court, upon looking through the complainants' case and allowing the full benefit of everything that has been legally established, had seen that a decree might now finally be rendered against the appellant. It would then have been nugatory to send it back for parties. But such is not the conclusion to which this court has arrived; it has already expressed the opinion that to a certain extent it is a very clear case for relief, and all the difficulties arise upon the nature of the *relief prayed and 204 granted. There is no knowing what new aspect may be given to the cause, when all the necessary parties come in and answer. But as it is now presented, had the prayer for specific relief upon the Sulphur Springs been out of the cause, it would not have been sent back without such a decree against the defendant, Caldwell, as the court below ought to have rendered.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and decreed by this court, that the decree of the said District Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that this cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said District Court for further proceedings to be had therein, according to law and justice.

205*] *JOHN LLOYD, Plaintiff in Error,

CHARLES SCOTT, Bailiff of WILLIAM S. MOORE, Defendant.

Rent charge—usury—Virginia statute—requirements of usurious transaction—ignorance of law—right to repurchase rent—usurious securities in hands of third persons—case of De Wolf Johnson—practice.

S. being seized in fee of four brick tenements and lots of ground in Alexandria, in consideration of five thousand dollars, granted to M. an annuity or yearly rent charge of five hundred dollars, to be issuing out of and charged upon the houses and ground, and covenanted that the same should be paid to M., his heirs and assigns forever thereafter, with the right to distrain in case of nonpayment of the same. In the deed granting the rent charge, M., the grantee, covenanted, that at any time after five years, on the payment of five thousand dollars with all arrears of rent, he, M., would release the said rent charge, and the same should cease. S. covenanted to keep the buildings in repair, and that he would have them fully insured against fire, and assign the policy of insurance for the protection of M., the money from the insurance to be applied to the rebuilding or repairing the houses, if destroyed or injured by fire. Afterwards, S. by deed of bargain and sale, conveyed to L., the plaintiff in error, the houses and lots of ground subject to the payment of the rent to M., who since the same conveyance has been seized of the same. The rent being unpaid, M. levied a distress for the same, and L. brought replevin; and the defense to the claim for rent set up to the avowry was, that the transaction was usurious, and the deed granting the rent charge was, by the laws of Virginia, absolutely void.

The statute of Virginia of 1793, provides that no person shall take, directly or indirectly, more than six per cent. per annum on loans of money or forbearance for one year; and it declares that all bonds and other instruments for a greater amount of interest shall be utterly void. [223]

The requisites to form an usurious transaction are, 1. A loan either express or implied. 2. An understanding that the money lent shall or may be returned. 3. That a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the statute shall be paid. The intent with which the act is done, is an important ingredient to constitute this offense. [224]

An ignorance of the law will not protect a party from the penalties of usury, where it is committed; but where there was no intention to evade the law and the facts which amount to usury, whether they appear upon the face of the contract or by other proof, can be shown to have been the result of mistake or accident, no penalty attaches. [224]

The act of usury has long since lost that deep moral stain which was formerly attached to it, and is now generally considered only as an illegal or immoral act because it is prohibited by law. [224]

If the court were in this case limited by the pleas to the words of the contract, and it purported to be a purchase of an annuity and no evidence were adduced giving a different character to the transaction, the argument that though the annuity may produce a higher rate of interest than six per cent. upon the consideration paid for it, as it was a purchase, it was legal, would be unanswerable. An annuity may be purchased like a tract of land or other property; and the *inequality of price [*206 will not of itself make the contract usurious. If the inadequacy of consideration be great in any purchase, it may lead to suspicion, and connected with other circumstances, may induce a court of chancery to relieve against the contract. [225]

In this case five thousand dollars were paid for a ground rent of five hundred dollars per annum. This circumstance, although ten per cent. be received on the money paid, does not make the contract unlawful. If it were a bona fide purchase of an annuity, there is an end of the question; and the condition which gives the option to the vendor to repurchase the rent by paying the five thousand dollars after the lapse of five years would not invalidate the contract. The right to repurchase, as also the inadequacy of price, would be circumstances for the consideration of a jury. [225]

The purchase of an annuity, or any other device used to cover an usurious transaction, will be unavailing. If the contract be infected with usury, it cannot be enforced. [226]

If the party agree to pay a specific sum, exceeding the lawful interest, provided he do not pay the principal by a day certain, it is not usury. By a punctual payment of the principal, he may avoid the payment of the sum stated, which is considered as a penalty. Where a loan is made, to be returned at a fixed day, with more than the legal rate of interest, depending on a casualty, which hazards both principal and interest, the contract is not usurious; but where the interest only is hazarded, it is usury. [226]

All the material facts to constitute usury are found in the second plea. It states a corrupt agreement to loan the money at a higher rate of interest than the law allows. That the money was advanced, and the contract executed in pursuance of such agreement. That on the return of the principal with the full payment of the rent, after the lapse of five years, the annuity was to be released. The amount agreed to be paid above the legal interest for the forbearance is not expressly averred, but the facts are so stated in the plea as to show the amount with certainty. Five hundred dollars, under cover of the annuity, were to be paid annually for the forbearance of the five thousand dollars; making an annual interest of ten per cent. Do not these facts, uncontradicted as they are, amount to usury? Is it not evident from this statement of the case, that the annuity was created as a means for paying the interest until the principal should be returned, and as a disguise for the transaction? Such is the legitimate inference which arises from the facts stated in the plea. [227]

The principle seems to be settled that usurious securities are not only void as between the original parties, but the illegality of their inception affects them even in the hands of third persons, who are entire strangers to the transactions. A stranger must "take heed to his assurance at his peril;" and cannot insist on his ignorance of the corrupt contract in support of his claim to recover upon a security which originated in usury. [228]

In the case of DeWolf v. Johnson (10 Wheat., 367), the first mortgage being executed in Rhode Island in 1815, was not usurious by the laws of that State; and the second mortgage executed in Kentucky in 1817, being a new contract, was not tainted with usury. The question, therefore, whether the purchaser of an equity of redemption can show usury in the mortgage to defeat a foreclosure, was not involved in that case. [229]

The law of Virginia having declared that a contract infected by usury is void, and by the deed from S. to M., a right to enter on the premises and distrain for the *rent is claimed under a deed, [*207 which, upon the admissions in the pleadings, is usurious; the premises upon which the distress was made, being held by L. under a conveyance from S., L. may set up the defense of usury in the deed, against the summary remedy asserted by M. under the deed. [230]

This case came before the court on a judgment in the Circuit Court for the defendant, the avowal in replevin, he having demurred to the pleas of the plaintiff in an action of replevin. The court having reversed the judgment of the Circuit Court, remanded the cause, with instructions to the Circuit Court to overrule the demurrer, and permit the defendant, the avowant, to plead. [231]

NOTE.—As to usury, see note to Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Cranch, 180; and note to Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 8 Wheat. 338; and note to Slacum v. Pomroy, 6 Cranch, 221.

Peters 4. U. S., Book 7.

THIS was an action of replevin brought by the plaintiff to replevy certain goods and chattels which the defendant, as bailiff of William S. Moore, had taken upon a distress for rent claimed by the said Moore to be due upon certain houses and lots in Alexandria, owned and held by the plaintiff. The sum for which distress was made is five hundred dollars. The declaration is in the usual form, and the damages claimed one thousand dollars.

The defendant filed his cognizance, in which he acknowledges the taking of the goods, &c., in the declaration mentioned, and states that a certain Jonathan Scholfield was seized in fee of four brick tenements and a lot of ground in the town of Alexandria, and being so seized, he, by his indenture, dated the 11th of June, 1814, of which deed profert is made, in consideration of five thousand dollars, by the said William S. Moore paid to him by the said Jonathan Scholfield, he granted, bargained and sold to him, the said William S. Moore, one certain annuity or yearly rent of five hundred dollars, to be issuing out of and charged upon the said four brick tenements and lot of ground, to be paid to the said William S. Moore, his heirs and assigns, by equal half-yearly payments of two hundred and fifty dollars each, on the tenth of December, and on the tenth of June in each year forever thereafter. To have and to hold the said annuity or rent charged and payable as aforesaid, to the said William S. Moore, his heirs and assigns, to his and their only proper use forever. It also states that the said Jonathan Scholfield, for himself, his heirs and assigns, did, by the said indenture, among other things, covenant with the said William S. Moore, his heirs and assigns, that he, the said 208 Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, would well and truly pay and satisfy to him, the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, the said annual rent of five hundred dollars by equal half-yearly payments forever; and if the rent should not be paid as it became due, that on every default it should be lawful for the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, to make distress for it. That the said William S. Moore was seized of the said rent on the said 11th of December, 1814, and has since remained seized thereof.

The cognizance further states that on the 29th of October, 1816, the said Jonathan Scholfield, by his deed of bargain and sale conveyed to the said John Lloyd, the plaintiff, forever, certain tenements and lots of ground in the said town of Alexandria, whereof the said four brick tenements and lot of ground before mentioned, on which the said distress was made was parcel; subject, by the terms of the said deeds, to the payment of the said annuity or rent of five hundred dollars to the said William S. Moore, his heirs and assigns. That the said John Lloyd has been ever since seized and possessed of the same; and that on the 10th of June, 1824, two hundred and fifty dollars, a part of the said rent, was due, and on the 10th of December, 1824, two hundred and fifty dollars, the balance of the said annual rent, was due and unpaid to the said William S. Moore, for which said sum of five hundred dollars, the said defendant, as bailiff aforesaid, levied a distress. It concludes by praying judgment for one thousand dollars, being double the rent in arrear and distrained for.

By the deed from Scholfield to Moore, he (Moore) for himself and his heirs and assigns, covenants with Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, that if he, the said Scholfield, his heirs or assigns, "shall at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the deed pay to the said Moore, his heirs or assigns, the sum of five thousand dollars, together with all arrears of rent and a ratable dividend of the rent for the time which shall have elapsed between the half year day then next preceding and the day on which such payment shall be made, he, the said Moore his heirs and assigns, will execute and deliver any deeds or instruments which may *bc necessary for releasing and extin- [209 guishing the rent or annuity hereby created, which, on such payments being made, shall forever after cease to be payable."

By the same deed Jonathan Scholfield covenants that he was then in his own right seized in fee-simple of the premises charged as aforesaid, free from any condition or incumbrance other than which is specified and provided for in a deed from him, Scholfield, to Robert I. Taylor, dated the day before the date of the deed to Moore.

The said Scholfield further covenants for himself, his heirs and assigns, that he "will forever hereafter keep the buildings which now are or hereafter may be erected on the premises charged, fully insured against fire in some incorporated insurance office, and will assign the policies of insurance to such trustee as the said Moore, his heirs or assigns, may appoint, to the intent that if any damage or destruction from fire shall happen, the moneys received on such policies may be applied to rebuilding or repairing the buildings destroyed or damaged." There is also a covenant on the part of Scholfield for a further conveyance to carry into effect the intention of the parties, and also a warranty on his part to warrant and defend the said annuity or rent to the said Moore, his heirs or assigns, against any defealcations or deductions for or on account of him, the said Scholfield, his heirs or assigns.

To this cognizance the plaintiff, after praying oyer of the indenture from Scholfield to Moore, demurred specially; and assigned the following causes:

1. Because the deed of indenture from Jonathan Scholfield and Eleanor his wife to William S. Moore, in the said cognizance mentioned, shows upon the face of it a corrupt and usurious contract between Jonathan Scholfield and William S. Moore, altogether void in law, and entirely incompetent to justify the taking of the said goods and chattels in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned.

2. Because the essential parts of the indenture are not set forth in the cognizance.

3. Because the indenture is variant, and different from that alleged in the cognizance.

*4. Because the whole cognizance is [210 void and insufficient in law to justify the taking of the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned.

At the same time the plaintiff filed four pleas. In each of which pleas he craves oyer of the deed of indenture in the cognizance mentioned, which was granted to him.

The first plea states that before the making of the indenture, that is to say, on the 11th of June, 1814, it was corruptly agreed between Scholfield and Moore, that he (Moore) should "advance" to Scholfield the sum of five thousand dollars, and in consideration thereof, that Scholfield and his wife should grant, by a deed of indenture duly executed and delivered to Moore, his heirs and assigns forever, a certain annuity or yearly rent of five hundred dollars, to be issuing out of and charged upon a lot of ground and four brick tenements and appurtenances thereon, which lot is particularly described in the said plea, and stated to be in the town of Alexandria; which annuity or rent of five hundred dollars was to be paid to Moore, his heirs and assigns, by equal half-yearly payments of two hundred and fifty dollars, on the 10th of December and on the 10th of June forever thereafter. It was further corruptly agreed that he, Scholfield, in and by the deed, should bind himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to Moore, his heirs and assigns, that Scholfield would well and truly pay to him, Moore, his heirs and assigns, the said rent or annuity of five hundred dollars, by equal half-yearly payments on the 10th of June and the 10th of December in each year forever thereafter, as it became due. It further states if the same should not be paid as it became due, the right of distress for it is reserved to Moore, his heirs and assigns. The plea also states if sufficient property could not be found on the premises to make the said rent or annuity, after the expiration of thirty days from the time the same became due, it should be lawful for Moore to enter on the premises and to remove Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, and for him, Moore, his heirs or assigns, to possess and hold the same as his or their property.

The plea further states that it was corruptly 211] agreed between *Scholfield and Moore, that he, Scholfield, should further covenant in the said indenture, that he, Scholfield, was seized at the time of making the deed in his own right, in fee-simple in the premises, free from any condition or incumbrance other than such as was specified in a deed from him to Robert L. Taylor; and that he would thereafter keep the buildings fully insured in some incorporated insurance office, and assign the policies to such trustee as Moore, his heirs or assigns, should appoint; and that he would make any other deed for a further assurance of the title to the premises; and that he would warrant and defend the title of Moore to the rent or annuity. It is also stated in said plea that Moore did further corruptly agree that he would, in the indenture, covenant for himself, his heirs or assigns, with Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, that if he, Scholfield, his heirs or assigns, should at any time thereafter, at the expiration of five years from the date of the indenture, pay to Moore, his heirs or assigns, the sum of five thousand dollars together with all arrears of rent and a ratable dividend of the rent for the time which should have elapsed between the half year's day then next preceding, and the day on which such payment should be made, he, Moore, his heirs and assigns, would execute and deliver any deeds or instruments which might be necessary for releasing and extinguishing the rent or annuity.

The plea then avers that on the 11th of June, 1814, in pursuance and in prosecution of this corrupt agreement, William S. Moore did advance to Jonathan Scholfield the sum of five Peters 4.

thousand dollars, and that Scholfield and his wife and William S. Moore did make, seal and duly deliver to each other respectively the said deed as their act and deed, which was duly acknowledged and recorded; that the deed was made in consideration of money advanced upon and for usury; and that there has been reserved and taken above the rate of six dollars in the hundred, for the forbearance of the sum of five thousand dollars, so advanced as aforesaid, for the term of one year. The plea concludes with a verification, and prays judgment for damages for the unjust taking and detention of the goods, &c.

*The second plea is in all respects like [212 the first, except it states that the agreement was that Moore should "lend" to Scholfield five thousand dollars. It then states that the parties agreed a deed should be made containing all the covenants set forth in the first plea. It then avers that in pursuance and in prosecution of this corrupt agreement, Moore did advance to Scholfield the sum of five thousand dollars; and that Scholfield and wife and Moore made and executed the deed aforesaid, in pursuance of this corrupt agreement, which was duly acknowledged and admitted to record. And that the deed was made in consideration of "money lent upon and for usury;" and that by it there has been reserved and taken above the rate of six dollars in the hundred, for the forbearance of the sum of five thousand dollars so lent as aforesaid for the term of one year. This plea concludes as the first does.

The third plea is more general than the first and second. It states that before the making of the indenture, that is to say, on the 11th of June, 1814, it was corruptly agreed between Scholfield and Moore, that he (Moore) should "advance" to him (Scholfield) the sum of five thousand dollars, upon the terms and conditions and in consideration of the covenants and agreements in the indenture mentioned and contained; and that in pursuance of this corrupt agreement, and in the prosecution and fulfillment of the same, Moore did advance to Scholfield the sum of five thousand dollars, and they, Scholfield and Moore, did make, seal, and duly deliver the deed to each party respectively, as their act and deed. And that the deed was in consideration of money advanced upon and for usury, and that by the indenture there has been taken and reserved above the rate of six dollars in one hundred, for the forbearance of the sum of five thousand dollars, so advanced as aforesaid for the term of one year. This plea concludes as the first does.

The fourth plea is like the third, except it is stated that the agreement was to "lend" five thousand dollars upon the same terms stated in the third plea. It then avers that in pursuance and in execution of the corrupt agreement in the indenture mentioned, Moore did "lend" to Scholfield the *sum of five thousand [213 dollars; that the deed was duly executed by the parties and recorded; that it was made in consideration of money lent upon and for usury, and that by the said deed there has been reserved and taken above the rate of six dollars in the hundred for the forbearance of the sum of five thousand dollars, so lent as aforesaid for the term of one year. This plea concludes as the others do.

To each of these pleas the defendant demurred specially, and assigned for causes:

1. That the said pleas do not set forth with any reasonable certainty the pretended contract, which is alleged to have been usurious, and do not show an usurious contract.

2. That they do not state the time for which the said pretended loan was made.

3. That they do not state the amount of interest reserved or intended to be reserved on the said pretended contract.

4. That they do not set forth any loan or forbearance of any debt.

5. That they neither admit nor deny the sale and conveyance of the premises charged with the said annuity or rent to have been made by Jonathan Scholfield to the plaintiff.

Upon the demurrer to the cognizance and on the demurrer to the pleas the Circuit Court rendered judgment for the defendant for one thousand dollars, the double rent claimed in the cognizance, and costs.

The plaintiff sued out this writ of error, and before this court assigned for error:

1. That the deed which forms a part of the cognizance is on its face usurious.

2. That the pleas set forth, with sufficient certainty, a spurious contract.

The case was argued by Mr. E. J. Lee and Mr. Swann for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Taylor for the defendant.

For the plaintiff, it was contended that the deed of Scholfield to Moore of the 11th of June, 1814, was a contract to pay five hundred dollars per annum for five years for the use of five thousand dollars, which is equal to ten per cent. 214 per annum. The object of this device was to evade the statute against usury. The deed does not set forth the purchase of an annuity; but Scholfield being seized of the property in fee, receives five thousand dollars from Moore as a loan, and then grants to Moore a rent of five hundred dollars per annum for the use of the money. The stipulations in the deed are to pay the rent half-yearly for five years, not to redeem the property by paying the five thousand dollars; and after that time, on his continuing to pay the five hundred dollars, the property is to remain charged with the same. The deed gives a right of distress and entry on the premises, and stipulates that the property shall be kept in repair and the buildings insured at the expense of Scholfield and his assigns. If any of the houses shall be destroyed by fire they are to be rebuilt, and there is a covenant for the payment of the rent against any defalcations or deductions by Scholfield. The whole sum payable by Scholfield in five years for interest, insurance, taxes and repairs, including the five thousand dollars, would amount to eight thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, a large excess beyond legal interest.

There must have been great distress to induce such a contract; and upon its face it exhibits all the features of usury, although there is no stipulation which plainly expresses the contract to be one of mere loan, with a compensation for forbearance beyond what is lawful.

It is not necessary that it should appear on the face of the deed that it was a loan or forbearance. If this is the result, it will authorize the application of the statute.

To show that the transaction on the face of the deed, though it assumes the form of a ground rent, is a usurious contract, cited, 1 Inst. book 3, sec. 534; 5 Co. Rep., 69; Lawley v. Hooper (3 Atk., 278); Flayer v. Sir Brownlow Sherard (Ambler, 19); 3 Barn. & Ald., 664; (4 Camp. Rep., 1; Powel v. Waters (17 Johns. Rep., 176); 5 Randolph's Rep., 347; Barnard v. Young (17 Ves., 44).

The preceding cases show that where there is a covenant either on the part of him who advances the money to accept of repayment or of the borrower to repay it, or where 215 the right to repay the money is reserved by the contract; that the money was advanced as a loan, and a contract entered into for its repayment, it is usurious.

But if it is urged that this is a contract for the sale of a rent charge, the answer is that at the time the contract was made no rent existed. It is an original grant of an annual rent to be issuing out of, and to be charged on certain houses.

Technically, an annuity is not a ground rent. (2 Blac. Com., 41, 461; Co. Lit., 144.)

Is the usury properly pleaded?

It is said that the contract is not set forth with reasonable certainty in the pleas. But the pleas bring out the whole deed in which the contract is shown, and thus the defendant is fully informed what that contract is upon which the allegation of usury arises.

An indenture set out upon oyer becomes a part of the plea. (1 Chitty, 664.) By becoming a part of the plea they set out the contract, and by so doing the defendant is informed of what he is to answer.

It is admitted that in a plea of usury it is necessary to set out the facts with such certainty as that they can be understood by the party to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain them, and by the court who are to give judgment upon them. (1 Chitty's Plead., 236, 237.) All these objects are fully obtained by the pleas filed in this case.

The second objection is that the pleas do not show a usurious contract. It is submitted to the court that the deed does show that five thousand dollars were paid, not for an existing ground rent, but that Scholfield was to pay for five years certain, five hundred dollars per annum for the use of that sum. The facts, as has been alleged, show this intention, and the desire of the parties to conceal it and give it the appearance of the purchase of an annuity or rent charged.

If the document produced by the plaintiff as his cause of action exhibits such facts as would if pleaded show a loan, then the defendant need not prove that the money advanced to him was a loan, nor need he prove by other evidence than the deed that the loan was mentioned by the lender before the making of the 216 contract, in the form in which it was executed. Usury is a question of law, and if all the facts which go to show the intent of the parties, appear by the showing of the plaintiff, by a special verdict or otherwise, it is sufficient. It is not necessary to state in the pleadings, or that the jury should find them, that there was a corrupt agreement. It is sufficient if facts appear which in law amount to usury. (Roberts v. Tremayne, Cro. James, 508; 1 Call, 62; Price v. Campbell, 2 Call, 119.) The intention of the parties is a legal inference from established facts. (5 Randolph, 145, 146 to 162; Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand., 352, 560; 4 Mun., 66; 6 Cranch, 652.)

The facts set forth by the deed, which forms a part of the pleas, according to the cases cited, show an usurious contract. The first plea states an advance of five thousand dollars for five hundred to be paid annually. Scholfield could not release himself from the payment of the sum for five years. The plea states that this advance was made and the deed executed in pursuance of this corrupt agreement, and that the five thousand dollars were advanced upon and for usury, and that there had been thus reserved and taken by Moore above the rate of six per cent. for forbearance of five thousand dollars for the term of one year. All this is admitted by the demurrer.

The second plea states this as lent. The third plea states the sum to have been advanced upon the agreement stated in the first plea; and the fourth is general, and states the sum as lent. The demurrer admits the money to have been lent and advanced as stated in the pleas.

The second objection to the pleas is that they do not state the time for which the loan was made. This is immaterial, as the pleas state that five hundred dollars are to be paid each year for the forbearance of five thousand dollars.

The plea expressly states that above the rate of six per cent. in the hundred dollars, for the forbearance of five thousand dollars, is reserved; and by making the deed a part of it, does state the forbearance to be for five years certain, and as long after as Scholfield pleased, or his inability to return the money continued. 217 The answer to the third objection is of the same character; the deed shows the amount of interest reserved and to be paid. It is expressly stated to be more than legal interest. To this point see 3 Term Rep., 533; 4 Term Rep., 353; 6 Rand., 661.

But in this case the party to the contract is not before the court, and he is not bound to set forth the usurious contract, as those are who were the immediate parties to it. (Hill v. Montague, 2 Maule & Selw., 377.)

The plaintiff in the replevin is not a party to this usurious contract. The defendant claims to make him liable to pay five hundred dollars by distraining his goods and chattels found on the premises charged by the contract between him and Scholfield; he is therefore a stranger to the particulars of the agreement, and he puts in the plea of usury. Less certainty is required when the law presumes that the knowledge of the facts is particularly in the opposite party. (1 Clitty Plead., 258; 13 East's Rep., 112; Com. Dig. Plead., c. 626.)

The fourth objection is that no loan or forbearance is set forth in the pleas. It is true the term loan is not used; but it is said the money was advanced, and that he was to receive five hundred dollars as a ground rent annually for five years for the advance, and that it was lent, and that Moore did lend five thousand dollars to Scholfield, for which he was to pay him five hundred dollars per year. The pleas all state that for the forbearance of the sum of five thousand dollars so advanced and lent, above the rate of six dollars in the hundred for one year was reserved and taken.

The fifth objection is that the pleas neither admit nor deny the sale by Scholfield to the plaintiff of the premises charged with the rent.

This is not material. If it was admitted that the sale was made by Scholfield to Lloyd charged with the annuity or ground rent claimed by the avowant, under a contract which in law is usurious, and therefore void, the plaintiff could not be compelled to pay, in the form of a rent, the usurious interest reserved by this contract.

The cause of demurrer was probably suggested by the case of De Wolf v. Johnson et al. (10 Wheat., 367). It is contended that the principles involved and decided in that 218 case do not apply to the case now before the court. The decision in that case rested mainly on the fact that the contract originally made was not usurious by the law of Rhode Island. The case before the court is one where the defendant seeks in the form of a distress for rent to make the personal property of the plaintiff liable under a contract which is usurious and void at law, and the question is whether the defendant can avail himself of such a contract.

A party in whose favor a contract which is usurious has been made, cannot make use of it for any purpose whatever. (Barnard v. Young, 17 Ves., 44; 1 Starkie's Rep., 385; Comyn. on Usury, 175; Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand., 356; Harrison v. Hammill, 5 Taunt., 780; Gaither v. The Farmer's Bank of Georgetown, 1 Peters's Rep., 37; Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns., 195.)

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Jones, for the defendants in error.

The pleas do not anywhere charge a loan to have been made on an usurious contract; it is only stated "and so the money was loaned upon usury." The charge of usury is a mere deduction from facts. The pleas state no collateral agreement as to a loan, and the whole of the contract is that which is contained in the deed. The deed in itself contains no contract which is usurious. It is a contract to pay the sum of five hundred dollars per annum in half-yearly payments for five years certain; and after that time the payment of five thousand dollars will be an extinguishment of the obligation, and a restoration of the property which is given to secure the payment. It is one thing to decide upon this contract as contained in the deeds, and another to decide on a collateral statement of usury.

The first question is whether Lloyd can avail himself of this usury if it existed?

He is bound by a contract with his vendor Scholfield; he is bound to pay this annuity to Moore, and it is important to Scholfield that he shall do so; as he, Scholfield, is under a personal contract to pay the same.

A deed is not void for usury, it is only voidable, as all deeds which take effect from delivery are not void, and must be made 219 so by pleading. (3 Burr., 1804; Bull. Nisi Prius, 224; 5 Co., 119.)

As this contract is only voidable, who can avoid it? can anyone do it? Certainly not a stranger.

By a reference to the Usury Act of Virginia, which is very full, its whole object will be seen to be to protect the parties to the contract. The spirit and object of it do not extend to other parties. By the third and fourth sections the relief in equity is confined to the borrower. He may go into chancery and recover the money lent and the interest, but if Lloyd recovers in this case, if he escapes the payment of the rent, Scholfield will lose the money given to him; he cannot afterwards recover from Moore.

Lloyd is not here a stranger, but he was acquainted with the facts and is bound to pay the rent. He cannot set up a plea of usury, which injures his vendor. He is estopped by his purchase from so doing.

The law of usury is different in cases of personal and real property. The assignee of an equity of redemption cannot plead usury in the mortgage; and a purchaser under a mortgage is not affected by usury in the origin of the contract. (10 Wheat., 367; 10 Johns. Rep., 185.) A mortgage upon an usurious consideration is void only against the mortgagee, and those who may lawfully hold the estate under him. A purchaser of the mere equity of redemption cannot avoid the mortgage by plea or proof of usury. (13 Mass. Rep., 515.)

Is it competent for an intruder to set up a title? or for a tenant at will to contradict the title of his landlord? A tenant in possession cannot set up usury against the title of his landlord. Idiocy and lunacy may be avoided by the parties, but not by strangers, and these rules will fully apply to other deeds. (8 Term Rep., 390; 4 Co., 123; 8 Co., 42; Co. Lit., 271, a.)

This transaction does not constitute a usurious contract. To such a contract the obligation to repay the money is essential. (Ord. on Usury, 23.) If the money may be returned or not, at pleasure, is it such a loan; and there must be a loan to make it usury. An option 220 to return makes the *transaction a purchase. These questions are exclusively proper for a jury, and the court cannot decide them.

This mode of investment is common in Alexandria. The purchase of a ground rent or rent charge is a usual mode of providing for families and children; and the usual price of such rents is ten years' purchase.

The pleas are bad in form and substance. 1. In pleading the statute, a general plea is bad. The agreement and sum taken must be charged and shown. The contract must be specially set out, and the usurious intention with which it was made must be set out. Forbearance, and giving day, are the effective words of the statute; and they must be averred. (1 Hawkins's P. C., 332, s. 24; Shower, 329; 2 Maule & Selwyn, 377; 1 Saunders, 295; Stephens on Pleading, 343.)

The pleas do not show an usurious agreement. They do not aver one collateral to the deed, but set out the deed in its terms. They call it usury. And the effect of the demurrer is not to assist the plaintiff. A demurrer admits facts well pleaded, not epithets or names or illegitimate conclusions. If the facts do not make out usury, no usurious intent can alter the legal character of the deed. Burton's case (5 Co.

Rep., 69) was the grant of an annuity; the plea sets out the facts, and charges them to be usurious. On demurrer, the court said that the matter shown does not amount to usury; the allegation that it is so is repugnant to the matter shown, and a demurrer is not an admission of all the matters pleaded, but of such only as are well pleaded.

The question then is, is the deed, per se, usurious? not whether it is evidence of another collateral contract. What is its legal import? Does it import a loan? It says it is a purchase. Does it mean anything else than the purchase of a redeemable annuity? It does not. The right to redeem after five years is secured by the deed. It has been repeatedly decided that the purchase of an annuity, at however extravagant a price, is not usury. (1 Wilson, 295; Cro. Eliz., 27; 2 Lev., 7; 3 Wilson, 390; 2 Schoales & Lcs., 393; 1 Bro. Ch. Rep., 94; Holt's Nisi Prius Cases, 295.)

Mr. Swann*, in reply, stated that the [*221] demurrer was entered to the deed because on its face it showed an illegal contract, and required no plea. (Cited, Chitty on Contracts, 239, 240; 1 Sid., 285; 1 Saund., 295; 5 Mod., 593.) At the same time the pleas were entered, which present, in different forms, the contract as a loan, as an advance, as a corrupt agreement. The demurrer admits the facts stated in these pleas, and all the inferences may be drawn which could be from facts found by a special verdict.

In answer to the arguments of the counsel for the defendants there were cited 3 Atk., 280; 1 Wilson, 295; 7 Bac. Ab. Usury, 194; 3 Bos. & Pull., 159; 3 Barn. & Ald., 664; 4 Camp., 1; 3 Harris & John., 109; 5 Munf., 223.

Mr. Justice McLEAN delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin brought to replevy certain goods and chattels which the defendant, as bailiff of William S. Moore, had taken upon a distress for rent claimed to be due upon certain houses and lots in Alexandria, owned and possessed by the plaintiff. The sum for which the distress was made is five hundred dollars.

The declaration is in the usual form, and the damages are laid at one thousand dollars. The defendant filed his cognizance, in which he acknowledges the taking of the goods specified in the declaration, and states that a certain Jonathan Scholfield, being seized in fee of four brick tenements and a lot of ground in the town of Alexandria, by his indenture, dated the 11th of June, 1814, in consideration of five thousand dollars, granted, bargained and sold to William S. Moore one certain annuity or yearly rent of five hundred dollars, to be issuing out of and charged upon the said houses and ground, and paid to the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, by equal half-yearly payments of two hundred and fifty dollars, on the 10th of December, and on the 10th of June, in each year, forever thereafter; to have and to hold, the said annuity or rent charged and payable as aforesaid, to the said William S. Moore, his heirs and assigns forever. It also states that the said Scholfield, for himself and his heirs and assigns, did, by the said indenture, among other things, 222*] *covenant well and truly to pay to the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, the said annual rent of five hundred dollars, by equal half-yearly payments forever. And if the rent should not be paid as it become due, it should be lawful for the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, to make distress for it. That Moore was seized of the rent on the 11th of December, 1814, and has since remained seized thereof.

The cognizance further states that on the 29th of October, 1816, the said Jonathan Scholfield, by his deed of bargain and sale, conveyed to Lloyd, the plaintiff, forever, certain tenements and lots of ground in the town of Alexandria, whereof the said four brick tenements and lot of ground were parcel, and subject to the rent charge stated. That Lloyd has been seized ever since and possessed of the same; and that on the 10th of June, 1824, two hundred and fifty dollars, a part of the rent, was due, and on the 10th of December following, two hundred and fifty dollars, the balance of the annual rent, was due and unpaid; for which sums the defendant, as bailiff, levied a distress.

The cognizance is concluded by praying a judgment for one thousand dollars, being double the amount of the rent in arrear.

Moore covenants in the deed that if Scholfield, his heirs or assigns, "shall at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the deed, pay to the said Moore, his heirs or assigns, the sum of five thousand dollars, together with all arrears of rent, and a ratable dividend of the rent for the time which shall have elapsed between the half-year day then next preceding the day on which such payment shall be made; he, the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, will execute and deliver any deeds or instruments which may be necessary for releasing and extinguishing the rent or annuity hereby created; which, on such payment being made, shall forever after cease to be payable."

Scholfield covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, that he would keep the buildings in repair; have them fully insured against fire; and would assign the policies of insurance to such trustee as Moore, his heirs or assigns, might appoint, that the money may be applied 223 to the rebuilding of *the houses destroyed by fire, or repairing any damage which they might suffer.

To this cognizance the plaintiff filed a special demurrer, which in the argument he abandoned, and relies upon the special pleas of usury. To each of the four pleas the defendant demurs specially, and assigns for causes of demurrer,

1. That the said pleas do not set forth with any reasonable certainty the pretended contract, which is alleged to have been usurious, and do not show an usurious contract.

2. That they do not state the time the said pretended loan was made.

3. That they do not state the amount of interest reserved or intended to be reserved, on the said pretended contract.

4. That they do not set forth any loan or forbearance of any debt.

5. That they neither admit nor deny the sale and conveyance of the premises charged with the annuity or rent to have been made by Scholfield to the plaintiff below.

Peters 4.

Upon these demurrers the Circuit Court rendered judgment for one thousand dollars, the double rent claimed in the cognizance.

The plaintiff here prays a reversal of this judgment.

1. Because the deed which forms a part of the cognizance on its face shows an usurious contract.

2. Because the pleas set forth, with sufficient certainty, an usurious contract.

The statute of Virginia against usury was passed in 1793, and provides that no person shall take, directly or indirectly, more than six dollars for the forbearance of one hundred dollars per annum; and it declares that all bonds and other instruments for a greater amount of interest shall be utterly void.

In support of the demurrer, it is argued that the pleas are defective, as they do not contain any allegation of facts which amount to usury; and that the decision must turn on the construction of the contract between Scholfield and Moore. And it is contended that although usury appears upon the face of a deed, yet advantage can only be taken of it by plea. That the obligee may explain the contract, by *showing a mistake in the scrivener, [224 or a miscalculation of the parties.

In Comyn on Usury, 201, it is laid down that in an action on a specialty, though it appear on the face of the declaration that the bond, &c., is usurious, still no advantage can be taken of this unless the statute be specially pleaded. (3 Salk., 391; 5 Coke's Rep., 119; Chitty on Contracts, 240; 1 Sid., 285; 1 Saund., 295, a.) The decision of this point is not necessarily involved in the case.

The requisites to form an usurious transaction are three:

1. A loan either express or implied.

2. An understanding that the money lent shall or may be returned.

3. That a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the statute shall be paid.

The intent with which the act is done is an important ingredient to constitute this offense. An ignorance of the law will not protect a party from the penalties of usury, where it is committed; but where there was no intention to evade the law, and the facts which amount to usury, whether they appear upon the face of the contract or by other proof, can be shown to have been the result of mistake or accident, no penalty attaches.

At an early period in the history of English jurisprudence, usury, or as it was then called, the loaning of money at interest, was deemed a very high offense. But since the days of Henry VIII. the taking of interest has been sanctioned by statute.

In this country some of the States have no laws against taking any amount of interest which may be fixed by the contract.

The act of usury has long since lost that deep moral stain which was formerly attached to it; and is now generally considered only as an illegal or immoral act, because it is prohibited by law. Assuming the position that the pleas contain no averments which extend beyond the terms of the contract, the counsel in support of the demurrers have contended that no fair construction of the deed will authorize the inference that it was given on an usurious con-

225*] sideration. *It was the purchase of an annuity, it is contended; and though the annuity may produce a higher rate of interest than six per cent. upon the consideration paid for it, yet this does not taint the transaction with usury.

If the court were limited by the pleas to the words of the contract, and it purported to be a purchase of an annuity, and no evidence were adduced giving a different character to the transaction, this argument would be unanswerable. An annuity may be purchased like a tract of land or other property, and the inequality of price will not, of itself, make the contract usurious. If the inadequacy of consideration be great in any purchase, it may lead to suspicion; and, connected with other circumstances, may induce a court of chancery to relieve against the contract.

In the case under consideration, five thousand dollars were paid for a ground rent of five hundred dollars per annum. This circumstance, although ten per cent. be received on the money paid, does not make the contract unlawful. If it were a bona fide purchase of an annuity, there is an end to the question; and the condition which gives the option to the vendor to repurchase the rent by paying the five thousand dollars after the lapse of five years, would not invalidate the contract. (1 Brown's Ch., 7, 93.) The right to repurchase, as also the inadequacy of price, would be circumstances for the consideration of a jury.

The case reported in 2 Coke, 252, is strongly relied on by the counsel for the defendant. In that case an action of debt was brought upon an obligation of three hundred pounds, conditioned for the payment of twenty pounds per annum during the lives of the plaintiff's wife and son. The defendant pleaded the statute of usury, and that he applied to the defendant to borrow of him one hundred and twenty pounds at the lawful rate of interest; but that he corruptly offered to deliver one hundred and twenty pounds to him, if he would be obliged to pay twenty pounds per annum.

The court considered this as an absolute contract for the payment of twenty pounds per annum during two lives; and no agreement being made for the return of the principal, it was not considered usury. But, they stated, if there 226] had *been any provision for the repayment of the principal, although not expressed in the bond, the contract would have been usurious.

This is a leading case, and the principle on which it rests has not been controverted by modern decisions.

Scholfield, it appears, was under no obligation to repurchase the annuity, but he had the option of doing so after the lapse of five years, which is a strong circumstance to show the nature of the transaction.

The purchase of an annuity or any other device used to cover an usurious transaction will be unavailing. If the contract be infected with usury, it cannot be enforced.

Where an annuity is raised with the design of covering a loan, the lender will not be exempted by it from the penalties of usury. (3 Bos. & Pull., 159.) On this point there is no contradiction in the authorities.

If a party agree to pay a specific sum exceeding the lawful interest, provided he do not pay the principal by a day certain, it is not usury. By a punctual payment of the principal he may avoid the payment of the sum stated, which is considered as a penalty.

Where a loan is made to be returned at a fixed day with more than the legal rate of interest, depending upon a casualty which hazards both principal and interest, the contract is not usurious; but where the interest only is hazarded, it is usury.

Does the decision in this case, as has been contended, depend upon a construction of the contract? Are there no averments in the pleas which place before the court material facts to constitute usury, that do not appear on the face of the deed?

If the court were limited to a mere construction of the contract, they would have no difficulty in deciding that the case was not strictly embraced by the statute.

In the second plea the plaintiff below prays oyer of the deed of indenture, and, among other statements, alleges "that it was corruptly agreed between the said Scholfield and the said Moore, that the said Moore should lend to him the sum of five thousand dollars, and in consideration thereof that he should *ex- 227 ecute the said deed, &c." And in another part of the same plea it is stated "that the said Moore did corruptly agree that he would in the said indenture covenant, &c., that if the said Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, should at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of said indenture pay to the said Moore, his heirs and assigns, the sum of five thousand dollars, together with all arrears of rent, he, the said Moore, would release to him the said annuity."

And it is further alleged "that the said Moore, in pursuance and in prosecution of the said corrupt agreement, did advance to the said Scholfield the said sum of five thousand dollars." And again, "that the said deed of indenture was made in consideration of money lent upon and for usury; and that by the said indenture there has been reserved and taken above the rate of six dollars per annum in the hundred, for the forbearance of the said sum of five thousand dollars so lent as aforesaid."

The fourth plea contains, substantially, the allegations as to the lending, &c., that are found in the second plea.

The facts stated in the pleas are admitted by the demurrers, and the question of usury arises on these facts, connected as they are with the contract.

Although the second and fourth pleas may not contain every proper averment with technical accuracy, yet they are substantially good. All the material facts to constitute usury are found in the second plea.

It states a corrupt agreement to loan the money at a higher rate of interest than the law allows. That the money was advanced and the contract executed in pursuance of such agreement. That on the return of the principal, with a full payment of the rent after the lapse of five years, the annuity was to be released. The amount agreed to be paid above the legal interest, for the forbearance, is not expressly averred, but the facts are so stated in the plea as to show the amount with certainty. Five hundred dollars, under cover of the annuity, were to be paid annually for the forbearance of the five thousand dollars, making an annual interest of ten per cent. Do not these facts, un-228*] contradicted *as they are, amount to usury? Is it not evident, from this statement of the case, that the annuity was created as a means for paying the interest until the principal should be returned, and as a disguise to the transaction? Such is the legitimate inference which arises from the facts stated in the plea.

At this point in the case an important question is raised—whether Lloyd, the plaintiff in the replevin, being the assignee to Scholfield, can set up this plea of usury in his defense. It is strongly contended that he cannot. He purchased this property, it is alleged, subject to the annuity, and paid for it a proportionably less consideration. That knowing of the charge before he made the purchase, it would be unjust for him now to evade the payment. And the inquiry is made whether Lloyd could plead usury in this contract if the annuity had been purchased by Scholfield. He would be estopped from doing so, it is urged, by the obligations of his own contract, as he is now estopped from resisting the claim of Moore.

As to the injustice of the defense, it may be remarked that the objection would apply with still greater force against Scholfield if he were to attempt, by a similar defense, to evade the payment of the annuity. He received the money after assenting to the contract; but he is at liberty to evade the payment of the annuity by the plea of usury. Is the position correctly taken, that no person can avail himself of this plea but a party to the original contract?

The principle seems to be settled that usurious securities are not only void as between the original parties, but the illegality of their inception affects them even in the hands of third persons who are entire strangers to the transaction. (Comyn on Usury, 169.) A stranger must “take heed to his assurance at his peril,” and cannot insist on his ignorance of the contract in support of his claim to recover upon a security which originated in usury.

In the case of Lowe v. Waller (Douglass, 735), the plaintiff was the indorser of a bill originally made upon an usurious contract, though he had 229*] received it for a valuable *consideration and was entirely ignorant of its vice, the Court of King's Bench, after great consideration, determined that the words of the statute were too strong; and that after what had been held in a case on the statute against gaming, the plaintiff could not recover.

If a bill of exchange be drawn in consequence of an usurious agreement for discounting it, although the drawer to whose order it was payable was not privy to this agreement, still it is void in the hands of a bona fide indorser. (2 Camp., 599.) In Holt's N. P., 256, Lord Ellenborough lays down the law that a bona fide holder cannot recover upon a bill founded in usury; so neither can he recover upon a note where the payee's indorsement through which he must claim has been made by an usurious agreement. But, if the first indorsement be valid, a subsequent usurious indorsement will not effect him, because such intermediate indorsement is not necessary to his title to sue the original parties to the note.

If a note be usurious in its inception, and it pass into the hands of a bona fide holder who has no notice of the usury, and the drawer give to the holder a bond for the amount of the note, the bond would not be effected by the usury. (8 Term Rep., 390.)

In the case of Jackson v. Henry, reported in 10 Johnson, 185, a plea of usury was set up to invalidate the title of a purchaser at a sale of mortgaged premises. This sale, under the statute of New York, is equivalent to a foreclosure by a decree in chancery; and the court decided that the title of the purchaser was not affected by usury in the debt for which the mortgage was given. The statute of New York declares all bonds, bills, contracts and assurances, infected with usury, “utterly void.” And so say the court, on the adjudged cases, when the suit at law is between the original parties, or upon the very instrument infected.

The case of De Wolf v. Johnson, reported in 10 Wheat., 367, is relied on by the counsel for the defendant as a decision in point.

In that case it will be observed that the first mortgage, *being executed in Rhode [230 Island in 1815, was not usurious by the laws of that State; and the second one, executed in Kentucky, in 1817, being a new contract, was not tainted with usury. The question, therefore, whether the purchaser of an equity of redemption can show usury in the mortgage to defeat a foreclosure, was not involved in that case.

The Virginia statute makes void every usurious contract; and the second plea contains allegations which, uncontradicted, show that the contract between Moore and Scholfield was usurious in its origin.

This contract, thus declared to be void, is sought to be enforced against Lloyd, the purchaser of the property charged with the annuity. Between Scholfield and Lloyd there is a privity; and if the contract for the annuity be infected with usury, is it not void as against Lloyd?

In this contract a summary remedy is given to enter on the premises and levy, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels there found, for the rent in arrear; and if the distress should be insufficient to satisfy the rent, and it should remain unpaid for thirty days, Moore is authorized to enter upon the premises and to expel Scholfield, his heirs and assigns, and hold the estate. Lloyd, as the assignee of Scholfield, comes within the terms of the contract: and is liable, being in possession of the premises, to have his property distrained for the rent, and if it be not paid, himself expelled from the possession. Under such circumstances, may he not avail himself of the plea of usury and show that the contract, which so materially affects his rights, is invalid? Moore seeks his remedy under this contract, and if it be usurious and consequently void, can it be enforced?

If usury may be shown in the inception of a bill to defeat a recovery by an indorsee who paid for it a valuable consideration without notice of the usury, may not the same defense be set up where, in a case like the present, the party to the usurious contract claims, by virtue of its provisions, a summary mode of redress.

The court entertain no doubt on this subject. They think a case of usury is made out by the facts stated in the second plea, and that Lloyd may avail himself of such a defense.

231*] *The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrers to the second and fourth pleas and permit the defendant to plead.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, holden in and for the County of Alexandria, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that this cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said Circuit Court, with instructions to overrule the demurrers to the second and fourth pleas, and to permit the defendant to plead, and for such further proceedings as to law and justice may appertain.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BOARD OF COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Defendants.

*Rights of former proprietors of Washington city

In 1822 Congress passed an Act authorizing the corporation of Washington to drain the ground in and near certain public reservations, and to improve and ornament certain parts of the public reservations. The corporation are empowered to make an agreement by which parts of the location of the canal shall be chauged for the purpose of draining and drying the low grounds near the Pennsylvania Avenue, &c. To effect these objects, the corporation is authorized to lay off in building lots certain parts of the public reservations, Nos. 10, 11, and 12, and of other squares, and also a part of B street, as laid out and designated in the original plan of the city, which lots they may sell at auction and apply the proceeds to those objects, and afterwards to inclosing, planting and improving other reservations, and building bridges, &c., the surplus, if any, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The act authorizes the heirs, &c., of the former proprietors of the land on which the city was laid out, who may consider themselves injured by the purposes of the act, to institute in the Circuit Court a bill in equity, in the nature of a petition of right against the United States, setting forth the grounds of any claim they may consider themselves entitled to make, to be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity; the court to hear and determine upon the claim of the plaintiffs, and what portion, if any, of the money arising from the sale of the lots they may be entitled to, with a right of appeal to this court. The plaintiffs, Van Ness and wife, filed their bill against the United States and the corporation of Washington, claiming title to the lots which had been thus sold, under David Burns, the original proprietor of that part of the city, and father of one of the plaintiffs, on the ground that by the agreement between the United States and the original proprietors upon laying out the city, those reservations and streets were forever to remain for public use, and without the consent of the proprietors could not be otherwise appropriated or sold for private use; that the Act of Congress was a violation of the contract; that by such sale and appropriation for private use the right of the United States thereto was determined, or that the original proprietors re-acquired a right to have the reservations, &c., laid out in building lots for their joint and equal benefit with the United States, or that they were in equity entitled to the whole or a moiety of the proceeds of the sales of the lots. Held, that no rights or claims exist in the former proprietors or their heirs, and that the proceedings of the corporation of Washington, under and in conformity with the provisions of the act, are valid and effectual for the purposes of the act.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Washington.

*The original bill in this case was filed [233 the 16th of April, 1823. It set forth that the complainant, Marcia Van Ness, was the only child and heir-at-law of David Burns, deceased. That Burns was, in his lifetime, and particularly on the 6th of July, 1790, seized and possessed of a considerable tract of land within the limits of the present city of Washington; that a part of this land constitutes so much of the land mentioned in the second section of an Act of Congress of May 7, 1822, c. 96, as is indicated in a map annexed to the bill of complaint by the words "Reservation Nos. 10, 11, and 12, on the north side of the Pennsylvania Avenue."

That by virtue of the said Act of Congress the corporation of the city of Washington have proceeded to lay off and divide the said land into lots; that they have sold some, and are about to sell others; that the land thus disposed of is to be held by the purchasers for their own private use and exclusive benefit, and the bill complains of these proceedings as a breach of trust.

It avers that on the 6th of July, 1790, an Act of Congress passed, establishing the temporary and permanent seat of government of the United States. By this act the President was authorized to appoint commissioners who were authorized to purchase or accept such quantity of land within the district as the President might deem proper for the use of the United States, and according to such plans as the President should approve. By virtue of this act, various proposals were made concerning cessions of land for the site of the city of Washington; the substance of which proposals was that the President might retain any number of squares he might think proper for the public improvements, or other public uses, and that the lots only which should be laid off should be a joint property between the trustees on behalf of the public and each of the three proprietors, and that the same should be equally divided between the public and the individuals, as soon as might be after the city should be laid off.

For the streets the proprietors were to receive no compensation. For the squares and lands in any form which should be taken for public buildings or any kind of public *im- [234 provement or uses, the proprietors, whose lands might be so taken, were to receive compensation, &c.

On the 28th of June, 1791, David Burns, by his deed, conveyed to Thomas Beall and John Mackall Gantt, in fee-simple, for the purposes and trusts therein mentioned, a considerable quantity of land, part of which constitutes the land described in the Act of May 7, 1822.

The whole of the land thus conveyed to Beall and Gantt was afterwards (30th of November, 1796) conveyed by them to the commissioners appointed under the act aforesaid, upon the same trusts and uses as are expressed in the deed of conveyance to them.

The plan of the city as originally projected by L'Enfant, improved and matured by Elliott, was approved and adopted in 1792 by the President of the United States. According to this plan, the land described is within the operation of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, except so much thereof as may have been sold by virtue of an Act of February 24, 1817, entitled, "An Act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington." The complainants are ignorant of the extent of these sales, but claim all which may thus have been disposed of.

The map referred to in the bill exhibits the division that was made under the direction of the corporation of the land in question into lots, and is the guide by which the sales have been conducted. A part of the land in question was not reserved for public improvements or other public uses, but belonged to a street called North B Street.

The complainants aver that the land in question, if sold to private individuals to be held by them for their individual benefit, will be placed entirely out of the reach of the trusts and purposes which were intended to be created and secured by the deed and agreement aforesaid. The complainants are advised this cannot be done without their consent, which they are willing to give upon the terms of the original contract. They are willing to occupy the same ground they would have occupied if what is now proposed to be done had been proposed in 1792; that is, that the land then reserved as public squares and streets, and now designed 235 to be divided into private building lots, should be divided between them and the United States, or the corporation claiming the title of the United States.

The complainants refer to an Act of May 6, 1796, authorizing a loan for the use of the city of Washington and to other acts of Congress, as uniformly holding out the idea that the land in question is not subject to congressional control. They refer also to the proceedings of the commissioners in Davidson's case, in January, 1794, a copy of which is annexed, and to the opinion of the Attorney-General in that case.

The complainants aver that they have presented their claim to the corporation of Washington, and to the commissioners appointed by the corporation, and urged a postponement of any further sale.

On the 19th of May, 1826, the complainants filed an amended bill, the substance of which is:

That Marcia Van Ness, the complainant, is the only child and heir-at-law of David Burns, deceased; that David Burns, in his lifetime, was lawfully seized in fee of the premises in question; that under an Act of Congress of July 16, 1790, and a supplementary Act of March 3, 1791, proposals were made by and on behalf of the President, thereto lawfully authorized, to various persons then the owners of different portions of land lying within the present limits of the city of Washington, relating to the purchasing and accepting from the proprietors, various parts of their lands lying within the limits aforesaid. In consequence of such proposals an agreement was finally made between the proprietors, among whom was David Burns and the United States, the terms and nature of which are set forth in an entry under date of April, 1791, in a book, &c., as set forth in the original bill. On the 28th of June, 1791, David Burns, in pursuance of the agreement and arrangement as aforesaid, made and executed his deed of conveyance to Beall and Gantt, as set forth in the original bill. Beall and Gantt conveyed, as recited in the original bill (setting out the trusts). Afterwards, on the 13th of December, 1791, the President transmitted to Congress a plan of the city which had been adopted as the permanent seat of government; that subsequently, various alterations [236 were made in the same, at different times, under the authority and sanction of the President. Many buildings squares have been introduced in addition to those contained in the plan originally adopted; alterations have been made in the number and directions of the streets; in the dimensions of the building squares and public appropriations; and in all such cases, when such alterations have been made and those pieces of ground which had been at any time appropriated as streets or public reservations, have been subsequently converted, either in whole or in part, into building lots, the variations have been by the mutual consent of the United States and the original proprietors respectively; and the lots in such building squares have been uniformly divided between the United States and such original proprietors.

They insist that such mutual consent and such distribution were not only required by the true meaning and legal and equitable interpretation of the original compact and agreement, but such practice acquiesced in by both parties ought to be deemed and received as the mutual understanding and design of the parties at the time of entering into it.

In pursuance of such original agreement and of the acts of Congress, the President did select and appropriate for streets, squares, parcels and lots, for the use of the United States, all the premises hereinbefore described, lying on the north and south sides of Pennsylvania Avenue, as aforesaid; being part and parcel of the premises as hereinbefore mentioned, conveyed and transferred by the said David Burns to Beall and Gantt, upon the trusts and confidences mentioned and declared in the deed of conveyance. That for all said premises neither Burns in his lifetime, nor the complainants since his death, have received any other consideration than such as is set forth in the deed, either from the trustees or from the United States. The said parcels of land continued to be held for the use of the United States as a public street or streets, or public appropriation, according to the plan and selection, until an Act of Congress, entitled "An Act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington," was passed, February 24, 1817; which act was procured at the instance and by the consent of the corporation of the city of Washington. Under this act the commissioner of the public buildings in the city of Washington was authorized to lay off into building lots and to sell a portion of them, being part of the premises hereinbefore described as lying on the north side of the Pennsylvania Avenue.

The residue of said premises continued to be held for the public use as aforesaid, until an Act of Congress was passed on the 22d of May, 1822, also procured at the instance and with the consent of the corporation, entitled, "An Act to authorize and empower the corporation of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to drain the low grounds," &c.

These acts of Congress are charged to be a clear and manifest departure from the terms and spirit of the original agreement and compact between Burns and the United States. The object and effect of them is to divert the premises from the trusts expressed and declared in the deed; that under such deed an interest still remained and continued in David Burns, which on his death descended to and now remains vested in the complainants; and that the said acts of Congress were passed without their concurrence or consent, and that the constitutional power of Congress and the rights of complainants will not permit or sanction the sale of the premises to private parties without such assent and concurrence.

The complainants insist, and submit to the court, whether the legal operation and effect of said acts be not to determine the trusts originally created as to said premises, and to re-vest the same in them; and whether, if they choose to assent to such appropriation of the premises, the same are not thereby immediately subject to the same trusts as in and by the indenture were expressed and declared as to all those portions of the premises thereby conveyed, as were not deemed proper and necessary by the President; or whether the complainants are entitled to the whole, or simply to a moiety of the money arising from said sales.

The bill proceeds to set forth that under the 238] Act of February *24, 1817, the commissioner was authorized to sell any number of the lots therein mentioned, not exceeding one-half; and that by the Act of May 22, 1822, the corporation of Washington was authorized to sell and dispose of the right of the United States of, in, and to the building lots therein mentioned; and if by virtue of said acts, any sales have been or shall be made previous to ascertaining and settling the rights of the complainants, much confusion, perplexity and trouble may ensue as well to the corporation and the individual purchasers as to the complainants.

Whereas, in and by the said last-mentioned act it was expressly enacted that it shall and may be lawful for the lawful representatives of any former proprietor of land directed to be sold, &c., at any time within one year from passing of the same, to institute a bill of equity in the nature of a petition of right against the United States in this honorable court, in which they may set forth the ground of their claim to the land in question, the complainants do within the terms of said act present their bill and claim such relief in the premises as may be conformable to the provisions of said acts, or agreeable to equity and good conscience.

And inasmuch as the corporation of Washington is authorized by said Act of Congress to carry the provisions of the same into effect, and deny any right or interest to the premises, or any part thereof to be in complainants, but claim a right to sell and dispose of the entire premises, and the exclusive right to receive and appropriate all the proceeds of the sales to their own use and benefit, and give out and insist that the complainants have no claim in law or equity to the land or proceeds, and have proceeded to carry the Act of Congress into operation; they pray, &c.

To this bill the defendants filed their joint and several demurrer, plea and answer; the substance of which is, they claim the benefit of all the prior exceptions and grounds of demurrer and plea heretofore taken to the original bill, and deny the equity of the bill. They specially set forth—

1. That the subject matter of complainant, the title therein *pretended, and the [239 entire relief prayed, are against an Act of Congress passed in the due exercise of a legislative discretion and constitutional power; and, therefore, not cognizable before any municipal court.

2. That the complainants have not shown any title or any individual and proprietary interest in themselves, but a mere participation of the general interests inherent in them as members of the community at large, in common with all the citizens of the United States in the administration of a public trust by the government.

3. They deny that the complainants have equity, and assert that if they have any title to the land it may be established at law.

4. That the bill is defective in its frame, scope and end. Because it is multifarious, and purports to have joined therein several matters and claims of different natures and repugnant characters. It is uncertain as to the nature, extent, and degree of the relief claimed and as to the party against whom it is prayed. It prays no process except an injunction against the corporation.

5. It is not in the nature of a petition of right, demanding any portion of the money arising from the sales of the lands, and merely setting forth the complainants' title to the land, to lay a foundation for their claim to the money, or to a portion thereof, as authorized by the Act of Congress; but it purports to claim against, and in derogation of the authority of said act, and to draw the United States into suit touching this claim. The United States and the corporation are joined in the suit, contrary to the design of the act, and without showing or alleging any interest in the corporation.

The defendants, by way of answer, admit that David Burns was seized, and did convey, as averred in the bill, and that the trustees conveyed to the commissioners as therein set forth; that the whole of the lands thus conveyed, except so much as from time to time has been divided and reconveyed, or has been sold or otherwise disposed of, still remains vested in the United States, or their officers or agents, absolutely and perpetually, for the use of the United States. The defendants insist that the legal as well as equitable estate has been [240 come vested in the United States, or at all events, that the legal interest has passed to the commissioner of public buildings in trust for the United States. In either case, they insist that the United States have the only beneficial interest and estate, and the absolute dominion and disposal of the same; and that Congress may and ought to dispose of the same on the terms and in the manner most advantageous to the general interest. They admit that about five hundred and forty-two acres were reserved for the use of the United States, and not allotted and divided; that these lands thus reserved were purchased at the rate of twenty-five pounds, or sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents per acre, paid out of the public treasury, which price was more than threefold the market price or real value, independently of the adventitious and speculative valuation superinduced by making this the permanent seat of government. The lands thus purchased for the use of the United States, and for which there was no responsibility to the original proprietors beyond the payment of the stipulated price, were distributed throughout the city, and were commonly known and distinguished as reservations, numbered from No. 1 to 17 inclusively. Of these the commissioners accounted with David Burns in his lifetime, for about one hundred and ten acres, and paid him two thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds, or seven thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents; but without any specification of the boundaries or lines.

All the lands described in the second section of the Act of May 7th, 1822, and which the corporation is authorized to lay out and sell, consist of parts of the reservations so purchased as aforesaid, excepting that part over which No. 10 is directed to be extended to Pennsylvania Avenue, which comprises so much of B street as lies between said avenue and said reservation, and was so taken in order to square out to said avenue the house lots into which the reservation was to be divided.

It is admitted that the part of B street (any more than the residue of the street, or the other streets) was not, when originally purchased for the use of the United States, set down 241 at any price, specifically appropriated to such parts of the property; but was included as an appendage in the purchase of the general mass of property paid for at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre, without being taken into the computation of the area to be paid for at that rate.

The defendants deny that there was any agreement, condition, understanding or trust, express or implied, between the United States or any of their officers, agents or trustees and the original proprietors or vendors; or that anything was given out or promulgated in the form of proposals or otherwise, either before or after the consummation of the contracts and conveyances by which the lands were sold and conveyed for the use of the United States as aforesaid, importing or implying, or in any manner holding out the idea, hope, or expectation, that the lands, or any part or parcel of the same, should be perpetually and inalienably retained as public property, or dedicated to any particular object of the public improvement; or that the general declaration of use should be limited, and restrained, so as to control the discretion of the government or Congress of the United States in the use or application of the property; except that these defendants have heard and believe, that at a very early stage in the adjustment of the plan of the city, the two principal quarters of the city and the particular appropriations of ground for the sites of the President's house and Executive Departments and Capitol were designated, and an implied pledge of the public faith was held out, not merely to the original proprietors, but to the public in general, that those great improvements should be permanently distributed and seated; but as to all the residue of the lands so purchased for the use of the United States, it was to remain at the absolute disposal of Congress.

The defendants have been informed and believe that the intent and object for keeping such extensive reservations of land in the heart of the city unappropriated, were to leave the hands of the government unfettered, and its discretion uncontrolled to dispose of such reservations in furtherance of such future and contingent purposes and views of improvement, ornament, or utility, as were not contemplated *or provided for in the original [*242 plan; and to leave the government at full liberty to modify and improve such plan according to such future and contingent views. That the practice of the government, its officers, agents and trustees, has always been conformable to this view of the uses and objects to which it was originally destined. If any of the reservations have received names as if appropriated to particular objects, they have been merely popular and arbitrary; and not from any authority, or founded on any pledge or trust, public or private, that they should be so appropriated. Whenever the public convenience has been thought to require it, the lands have been applied without regard to such popular and arbitrary designations, or to any such terms or conditions as the complainants pretend. That the specific purposes and objects designated in the Act of Congress for the application of the proceeds are of the first importance and highest public utility, in reference to the primary design of laying out and embellishing a splendid, populous, and well-ordered capital; which was to be reclaimed from wasted tobacco fields and noxious morasses; and that without the improvements to be accomplished by these means, the city never can fulfil the ends and purposes for which it had been selected as the permanent seat of government.

The corporation, answering for themselves, further say that without delay a board of five commissioners was organized for the purpose of carrying into execution the Act of 1822, according to certain directions in the act and in the ordinance of the corporation; that the commissioners did proceed to lay off the parcels of ground into squares and building lots, and proceeded to make sale of some of them, when they were stopped by the injunction issued at the prayer of the complainants. When the same was dissolved, they again proceeded, and have disposed of the greater part of the same, and intend with all convenient speed to dispose of the residue. Of all which actings and doings, they are prepared to render an account, when they shall be so required and directed.

The complainants filed a general replication; and after argument, the Circuit Court dismissed the bill with costs.

The complainants appealed to this court. 243] *The case was argued by Mr. Coxe and Mr. Taney for the appellants, and by Mr. Berrien, Attorney-General, for the United States; and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Wirt, with whom was Mr. Webster, for the corporation of Washington.

Mr. Coxe, for the appellants, stated that the claim of the appellants was founded on the admitted original right of the ancestor of Mrs. Van Ness in the premises, and upon the contracts and conveyances by which he parted with these lands. It is contended:

1. That these conveyances and contracts did not vest in the United States an absolute and indefeasible title, but passed an imperfect and qualified estate, to which certain trusts and conditions were annexed, intimately connected and interwoven with the title; and the condition having been broken, and the trusts violated or run out, the estate granted has terminated.

2. If such should not be deemed the legal result from the facts in the case, the complainants will contend that according to the only fair interpretation which can be given to the contracts in question, these premises must now be considered as if originally converted into building lots, and to be equally divided between the government and the original proprietor. Or,

3. That if the interest vested in the United States could not be divested without an actual sale to individuals, then, under one aspect of the case or another, the plaintiffs must be entitled to the whole or a moiety of the proceeds.

It is admitted that the soil originally belonged to David Burns, the father of the complainant Marcia. This could only be divested by his voluntary act. The right of sovereignty before the cession was in the State of Maryland.

The first article, section eighth, of the Constitution of the United States, gives to Congress the right of exclusive jurisdiction over the district, and in other cases. Under this clause the right of sovereignty over the district is in the general government, and under the second section the right is recognized to acquire real property for certain designated and stipulated purposes.

244*] *It is a fair inference from this part of the Constitution that if Congress can constitutionally acquire the ownership of property within any particular State, its rights are simply those of an individual; and the assent of the States must concur before the sovereign power can be vested. This is specifically provided for as to the District of Columbia by the cessions of Maryland and Virginia. (Burch's Dig., 213, 218, 219.)

Under these acts, as sovereign, Congress has no right in or connection with private property, further than the States held which ceded their jurisdiction. The rights of the United States are derived from individual authority, and are not granted by the States.

The whole foundation, then, of the government title to the real estate in the District of Columbia, rests upon compact with individual proprietors. All the powers which can be lawfully exercised over the property, must be derived from the same source. No rights can thus be created which the former owner did not himself possess.

The private compacts and conveyances which confer this right, must be subject to the same rules of interpretation and construction as if they were contracts between private citizens. The government, in making these contracts, descends from its sovereign elevation, lays down its privileges and prerogatives, and places itself in all respects, as to right, upon a level with the individual citizen.

2. What, then, is the character, and what the terms of the conveyance and agreement under which the controversy arises?

Under the powers reposed in him by law, President Washington, having selected a site for the contemplated city, met the proprietors of the land covered by it on the 12th of April, 1791 (Burch's Dig., 332), when he made to them certain propositions, and explained his views relative to the same. The owners generally came to an agreement, which formed the basis of the various deeds of trust which were executed immediately after.

The language of this agreement is peculiar and unambiguous. The President is authorized "to retain any number of squares, &c., he may think proper for public improvements or other *public uses." The form of the convey- [245ance is not alluded to, neither is the extent of the estate to be granted; the object exclusively regarded is the purpose for which the land is to be retained.

This agreement may be considered, in connection with the legislative acts and the conveyances, as the contract between the parties. (4 Wheat., 656.) It contains the stipulations which were to be executed by formal conveyances.

The conveyances to Beall and Gantt, the trustees, will be found to correspond with this agreement. The language of those conveyances is, "to the said Beall and Gantt, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor;" the habendum is in these words: "to have and to hold the hereby bargained and sold lands, with their appurtenances, unto the said Beall and Gantt, and the survivors of them, and the heirs of such survivor, to and for the special trust following, and no other, &c." And this trust is created by these words: "and the said Beall and Gantt, or the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, shall convey to the commissioners, &c., and to their successors, to the use of the United States forever, all the said streets, and such of the said squares, parcels and lots as the President shall deem proper for the use of the United States.

It is obvious that the parties considered the contract as still executory; no legal title passed to the United States, or even to the commissioners; but a subsequent conveyance for this purpose was evidently contemplated. The abolition of the office of commissioner has prevented the execution of this design.

The agreement of the 12th of April, 1791, must still be considered as substantially setting out the intentions of the parties; and although wholly informal, "it is an agreement showing the intent of the parties, and therefore sufficient to declare a use." (4 Mod., 264.)

The Maryland Act of Cession refers to this agreement as well as to the conveyance, and the inquiry is, what was the intention of the parties, as the same can be gathered from the documents referred to?

It embraces three distinct species of property: 1. The *public streets. 2. The public reservations. 3. The building lots. All the ground within the limits of the city is comprehended within one or other of these descriptions.

The first were to be absolutely vested in the government without any compensation further than such as should arise from the enjoyment of this public right of way. The second was to embrace the squares, parcels, and lots, which the President might deem proper for the use of the United States; or, as the original agreement expresses it, "which the President might deem proper for public improvements or other public uses." These were to be paid for at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre. 3. The building lots, which were to be equally divided between the United States and the original proprietors. All the premises in controversy in this case are comprehended within the two first descriptions.

If the language employed in this agreement and conveyance can receive any precise construction, it means that the parties agree to convey, and did convey "such squares, parcels and lots as the President might deem proper for the use of the United States." If this be ambiguous, all doubt will be removed by reference to the terms of the agreement, where the property, as well as the object of the conveyance, is specifically described "as lands in any form which shall be taken for public buildings, or any kind of public improvements," and "for public improvements or other public uses." These, then, are the objects of the grant.

Where an agreement embraces a number of distinct subjects which admit of being separately executed and closed, it must be taken distributively; each subject being considered as forming the matter of a separate agreement after it is closed. (11 Wheat., 237, 251; cited, also, 1 Coxe, 270; Sugden, 209; 12 Johns. Rep., 436.)

It might have occurred that the land of one proprietor was appropriated to these public objects, and all that of another to building squares. The construction, then, to be given to the various matters, must be the same as if three distinct conveyances had been executed after the plan of the city had been adopted, and with a specific appropriation of each portion of the premises.

247* A conveyance, then, of a particular tract of land to the United States "for public improvements or other public uses," "for public buildings or any kind of public improvements," or "for a street," would have fixed beyond a doubt the purpose to which the subject conveyed was to be applied, and would have constituted an agreement of the most solemn obligatory character.

3. Having ascertained the substance of the agreement, it is immaterial whether we consider the contract as creating a charity, a trust, an estate upon condition, a dedication to the public, or anything else of a similar character.

In England it would have been deemed a charity. (4 Ves., 543; 7 Johns. Ch. Rep., 292; 5 Harr. & Johns., 392; 6 Harr. & Johns., 1.) It is immaterial that we have no statute similar to that of 43 Elizabeth.

Peters 4.

The object and effect of that statute appear to have been to give validity to certain dispositions of property which otherwise would have been void. If, in the cases put, the will required the aid of the statute, such was its operation. If in this case, the assistance of a similar statute should be deemed necessary, it must be on the principle that, at common law, the conveyance would be void. If, however, no assistance is thus required, or should the various statutes under which these arrangements have been made legalize them, the trusts designated are valid as a charity.

But a charity must be accepted upon the same terms upon which it is given, or it must be relinquished to the right heir; for it cannot be altered by any new agreement between the heirs of the donor and the donees. (4 Wheat., Ap., 15; Finch, 322; 3 Merivale, 400, 401, 417.)

Considering it as a condition annexed to the grant that the land should be appropriated to "public buildings," or "other public uses," the result would be the same.

By the disposition the government has made of the premises, the sale of all its interests to individuals, it has misapplied this property, and deprived itself of the power to perform the condition. Such a misapplication was held in Porter's case to give to the heir of the donor a right of entry. (1 Rep., 16.)

*The interest created is, however, as [*248] well from the nature of it as from the terms employed, nothing more than a trust in some of its modifications.

The contract is entirely executory in its character. It indicates the general object of a conveyance thereafter to be made. Even the deeds from the proprietors to the trustees were but a part execution of the agreement. They contemplated another instrument to convey the legal title to the United States.

The conveyance to the trustees being a deed of bargain and sale, the estate of the United States under it could be nothing more than an equitable one.

It is a settled principle that no use to be executed by the statute by force of such a conveyance can be declared, excepting to the bargainee. (3 Johns., 383; 4 Cruise's Dig., 494; 16 Johns., 302.)

To the whole extent of this controversy the contract is still executory, and completely within the control of a court of chancery; who in framing a conveyance will make it correspond with the intention of the parties.

This intention is to be collected from the original agreement. It is clearly established that without any strict adherence to the forms of instruments, the intent of the parties will operate. (4 Mod., 264; 2 Atk., 577, 582; 1 P. Wms., 123; 1 Bro. P. C., 288; 3 Bro. P. C., 31, 33; 3 Com. Dig., 587; 1 Jac. & Walk., 550; 1 Prest. on Est.)

The beneficial interest under these instruments in the United States is clearly an executory equitable interest. It rests in fieri, and the court will endeavor to ascertain the design of the parties in relation to the extent of this interest, and measure their rights by such intention. All trusts are, indeed, executory. (1 Cruise's Dig., 489; 1 Prest., 186.)

If the view of the intention which has been taken is the correct one, the premises in question were to be apportioned exclusively to objects of a public character—to public improvements, or other public uses.

The property has, however, been diverted from these objects, and has been sold out to 249 individual proprietors, and is now occupied and enjoyed by them for their private advantage. What, then, is the result of this misappropriation?

The rule of equity seems to be that when the purpose for which a trust was created either ceases or never comes into existence, it is to be considered as if it had never been contemplated. And the benefit of the estate upon which it has been charged must result to those to whom the law gives the estate, in default of disposition by the right owner. This is the whole foundation of resulting trusts.

Estates vested in trustees for the purpose of raising money, if the power is never exercised or the incumbrance is discharged, the estates granted to the trustees terminate. Estates vested in trustees to preserve contingent remainders, if the contingency never arises or the estate in the trustee is at an end before it occurs, revert to the grantor. (1 T. R., 760; 4 Ves., 60; 2 Ves., 399, 406; 7 Com. Dig., 588; 1 Cruise's Dig., 475; Prec. in Chan. 541; 2 P. W., 20; 1 Prest. on Est., 182, 183.)

This sale of the premises amounts to an abuse of the trust, and it can confer no right on the party abusing it, or on those who claim in privity with him. (7 Com. Dig., 619; 3 Maule & Selw., 574.)

No beneficial interest vested in the trustees, Beall and Gantt. They took an estate for the single purpose of conveying it to the commissioners. In the execution of this power they were bound to regard the intention of the parties, without any scrupulous adherence to the phraseology of the conveyance. Whatever might be the nature of the words of the conveyance to them, nothing more passed to them than was necessary to enable them to execute the power confided to them.

If they could now be required to execute that power, and convey the premises in pursuance of it, in framing their deed they must look to and be governed by the obvious intention of the parties. (Doug., 565, 573; 3 T. R., 665, 674.)

If the formal parts of the conveyance should be deemed immaterial, and the equitable interests of the parties alone be regarded, this may be considered as a qualified or base fee in the premises, in the United States.

250* *Qualified or base fees are, substantially, nothing more than fees upon condition. In general, the qualification is annexed to the person of the tenant; but it is not material whether it was annexed to the land or the person holding the land; whether the condition should be determined by the tenant personally, by an act different from that upon which the estate depended, or by the land being discharged of the condition.

In this case it would be equally immaterial whether the language of the conveyance made it the personal duty of the tenant to appropriate the land for the designated purposes, or whether it required the land to be so applied. (1 Prest. on Estates, 431.) The residuary estate is in the grantor. (1 Prest. on Est., 117, 156.)

Such a grant may well operate as a dedication to public uses; in which case it would also partake of the qualities of a trust, and be governed by the rules applicable to trusts. (2 Strange, 1004; 9 Cranch, 331; 2 Johns., 363; 12 Serg. & Rawle, 29.)

Upon these grounds, or some of them, it is apparent that by the operation of the acts of Congress to which reference has been made, and the sale of the individuals who have purchased, the premises have been discharged of the trust originally created. The public, to whose use they have been dedicated, have renounced the interest thus created; and the original proprietors are reinvested with their original title.

It is objected that Congress possess the powers of sovereignty, responsible to the entire people of the Union, and answerable to the nation at large for the manner in which it discharges its duties and executes its powers. This is said to exclude all claims for recompense for the exercise of these powers by individuals. To this it is answered, that such political powers may belong to Congress, and the position assumed may be true, so far as the rights of individuals are not by compact connected with the operations of government. But when it acts upon individual rights, the party whose person is violated, or whose property is invaded, is separated from the mass of the community; and if his case be one in which a court may [251 act, he may invoke the Constitution and law for his protection and indemnity.

Compacts may be made by the government, and individuals may acquire rights under those compacts. It is incompatible with our institutions to say that holding these rights, government is acting as a sovereign, and is responsible only to the nation for its doings.

The property of individuals may be wrested from them by acts of the government; but it will not do, in a case where the law can interpose, that the citizen shall not claim its aid, because it is a sovereign act.

When government enters into contracts with individuals, it parts with its sovereignty. (9 Wheat., 907.) In the case of The United States v. Barker, the government was held bound in all proceeding upon bills of exchange to adhere to the same rules as govern individuals.

According to the general principles of the law of nations, the Act of Cession would not have impaired individual rights. But the peculiar provisions of the Act of Cession give this principle additional sanction; all the right of the United States to land here, depends exclusively upon the compacts made with individuals.

It is then immaterial whether it holds its powers and property in trust for the community or not. The question is, what is the extent of its property, and its rights to that property? and this cannot be affected by the inquiry for whose benefit they are holden. They cannot be enlarged or diminished by the circumstances that they are held by a sovereign power for the general good.

If the appellants are right in their view of the nature of the estate existing in the premises—if this was a charity, and the object of the donation was the public, Congress, representing that public, may renounce this beneficial interest. If it is a trust, and the public are the cestuis que trust, Congress, representing them, may relinquish all the advantages secured to the community. If it is a dedication to the public, Congress may discharge the estate of this servitude or easement.

While it is conceded that Congress, in the exercise of their power over the public property, are absolute, and are *responsible only to the nation, the legal effect or operation of such renunciation is wholly disconnected with any question of sovereignty.

It is objected that the original proprietors have been paid a full price for the lands in controversy. It is not considered as of any moment how this fact was. In determining what was conveyed, what estate did pass, the question of what was paid for it is an immaterial one. The party was paid for what he conveyed, he received his compensation for what he granted; but the question still recurs, what did pass by the conveyance? No court can enlarge or diminish the effect of the granting part of a deed by referring to the amount of consideration, and deducting from that any rule of interpretation.

It is also insisted that the beneficial purposes to which the proceeds of these sales are applicable are fatal to this claim. These can have no effect upon the question really involved in this case. However judicious the appropriation of the proceeds arising from a violated trust, it will not influence the inquiry whether it was violated.

As to the suggestion that the remedy of the appellants was at law, and not in equity, it is answered that the Act of Congress furnishes the specific remedy by bill, in the nature of a petition of right; and if the case presents a trust, it is peculiarly within the guardianship of a court of chancery.

Whether there is in this proceeding a misjoinder of parties will depend upon the result of the case. The corporation of Washington, acting under the Act of Congress, sells the land and receives and applies the proceeds. If an account is to be directed, it is the only party which can furnish one.

It is also submitted, that the only effect of sustaining this objection would be a decree in favor of the corporation. The consequences of a misjoinder in chancery are very different from what they are at law in an action ex contractu.

The parties, appellants, have a beneficial interest in the continued devotion of the property to public uses which a court can notice. (4 Wheat., 630, 641, 697.) The proprietors of every lot are interested in the size of the streets 253] and in *their direction; in the situation of public squares, and in the location of public institution and buildings.

The original proprietors are especially interested, 1. In diminishing the number of building lots thrown into market. 2. By the enhanced value of their remaining property, in consequence of its vicinity to a public square, or fronting on a commodious street.

Such was the intention of all parties to the compacts and arrangements relative to the city of Washington; and this fully appears from all the circumstances of the case, as well as from the language employed.

act passed before the execution of the instruments, did not authorize the purchase or acceptance of property in general, and without limit. The third section authorizes the commissioners to purchase or accept such quantity of land within the district as the President might deem proper for the use of the United States. The fourth section empowers the President to accept grants of money to defray the expenses of such purchases, and of erecting the necessary buildings. There is nothing in this act relating to the city, or the plan of the city, to public streets, or to reservations for city objects.

No authority is given even relative to the building lots, considered as real estate conveyed to the government. The building lots never were conveyed to the United States. They were granted to trustees, a moiety of them to be regranted to the proprietors, and the residue to be sold; and after deducting so much from the proceeds as would pay the former proprietor twenty-five pounds per acre, the residue was to go to the United States, as a donation in money; the objects to which the money was to be appropriated being specifically designated.

The Act of the Legislature of Maryland of 1791 conforms to this view of the case.

The President and the commissioners are by the Act of Congress invested with special powers which they cannot transcend, and it appears that either the estate conveyed must be strictly in accordance with those powers, or that the instruments of conveyance are void. The authority is *vested in them in affirmative words, and this is equivalent to a negation of any other authority. (2 P. Wms., 207.)

A review of the various acts of Congress passed subsequently, shows that the government never contemplated that the contract was susceptible of the interpretation now the subject of complaint. Mr. Coxe here cited and commented on the acts of May 6, 1796, April 18, 1798; April 24, 1800; January 12, 1809, and July 5, 1812; and contended that these various legislative acts conclusively settled the interpretation of the contract, and showed that the signification attached to the phrase, "use of the United States," was synonymous with "public purposes," and other similar forms of expression. A resolution of Congress in the session of 1804 is to the same effect.

But the government has in fact paid nothing for these lands. The various instruments between the parties and the various acts of Congress already cited, show that each proprietor whose lands were appropriated to public purposes was to recover the compensation of twenty-five pounds per acre, out of the proceeds of the building lots selected on his own tract. No other fund was pledged, and this was the practical construction placed upon the compact by the commissioners.

Mr. Wirt and Mr. Jones argued the case for the corporation of the city of Washington.

Mr. Wirt contended that there was but one aspect in which the bill of the appellants presents a case which is within the jurisdiction of the court. It is that in which it asks a partition of the proceeds of the sales of the lots. The only substantial defendant is the United States, and the United States being a sovereign, cannot be sued.

It is said that the Act of Congress of 1822 dispenses with this sovereignty and permits this suit. This is true, so far as the act does dispense with the sovereignty, but no further. The terms of the law are to be carefully observed. The dispensation is a limited one. It permits a suit for the proceeds, and the court cannot assume jurisdiction beyond this point. So much of the bill, therefore, as seeks to enjoin 255 the *United States from letting lots, or asks for a decree for the land specifically, is coram non judice.

It did not require a plea to raise this question of jurisdiction, for the want of jurisdiction is apparent on the bill. On the face of the bill the court will see that the United States is the only material defendant, and the bill refers expressly to the Act of 1822, as the authority for the proceedings. That act thus becomes a part of the bill; it authorizes a suit for no other purpose, and to no other extent, than to ascertain whether the defendants be entitled to any part of the proceeds.

As to dismissing the bill against the United States, and retaining it against the corporation. Can this be done? The Act of 1822 declares that the proceedings shall be conducted according to the principles of equity; and can a court of equity proceed to a decree in the absence of a material party?

But it is clear that the corporation is merely the organ of the government under the Act of 1822, and thus a limited agency, confined to the selling of the lots and applying the proceeds under the sale, is in the corporation. Can the agent of a sovereign be sued for the purpose of stripping the sovereign of his rights of property.

Again, what decree could be rendered against the corporation? Could there be a decree for this property? The corporation has no right of property. It is not even an agent of the government to defend the property in a judicial proceeding; its agency being limited to the special ministerial acts designated by the law of 1822.

Under what principles, then, which regulate the proceedings of courts of equity, could a decree for this property pass against the corporation of the city of Washington? Of what avail would such a decree be against the United States? Decrees bind those only who are parties and privies; and if the bill be dismissed against the United States for want of jurisdiction, in what sense could they be said to be parties or privies to the suit which would remain against the corporation? The corporation claim no rights of property, and are entrusted with no 256 agency to defend this suit—they are the mere servants of the government in performing the ministerial acts presented by the law of 1822.

We might well insist that the whole bill should be dismissed as not conforming in its character to the only bill permitted by the law to be settled by the appellants. But it is the interest of all parties that this controversy shall be terminated.

There is, it is repeated, but a single aspect in which this case can be regularly presented; it is that it shall be considered a bill in the nature of a partition of right, claiming the proceeds of the sales.

In deciding this question the court must necessarily decide, incidentally, on the title of the complainants to the property. If they have a right to half the proceeds, it can only be because, on some principle of law or equity, they show title to half the property.

2. Are the complainants entitled to the proceeds or to any portion of them? This must depend upon the contract under which the original proprietor parted with the property and conveyed it to the United States.

If he parted with the property sub modo—if there was any condition in the contract that it should be applied to a specific use, and that, if not so applied, it should return to the original owner or to his heirs—then, if it has not been so applied, the claimants are entitled to the proceeds. But if the conveyance to the United States was absolute, and for a good and full consideration, and the indication of the use was referred by the terms of the contract to the pleasure of the United States; then it must be manifest that the complainants are not so entitled.

It would seem that the opinion that the complainants are entitled to some part of these proceeds has arisen from confounding the case with others reported in the books, to which it bears no just resemblance, but from which it is distinguished by circumstances which withdraw it entirely from the influence of those decisions.

Thus, cases are cited of charities which are free gifts of property dedicated on the face of the instrument itself, which made the gift to a special use—free gifts, in which the donor had *been induced to make them by no 257 pecuniary interest, but which proceeded solely from his disinterested bounty and charity.

But these reservations were not free gifts. They were sales founded on a most valuable consideration, in which the vendor had most important pecuniary interests at stake; and this consideration was of a twofold character. 1. The establishment of the federal city on their lands, which has made the desert smile. 2. The direct consideration of twenty-five pounds paid for every acre of the reservation.

The cases of charities have therefore no application, because these were not gifts, but purchases. They have no application, because here there was no dedication on the face of the instrument to any specific use, but that was left open and was placed solely at the pleasure of the United States.

Nor is there any trust, express or implied, raised on the face of the contract in behalf of the original proprietors nor any use for them; the whole trust and use being for the benefit of the United States.

Neither is there seen in the case a single feature which brings it in any degree within the range of those cases which have been cited of estates granted on condition, or of cases of determinable fees. For here is no condition, annexed to the grant, unless it may be regarded as a condition that the property is to be applied to the use of the United States; a condition in the due performance of which the original proprietor had no other interest than any other citizen of the United States. Nor is there anything which makes this a defeasible or determinable fee, because the fee is in perpetuity to the United States.

The argument on the other side proceeds entirely on these two propositions: 1. That this was a free gift of property on the part of Mr. Burns. 2. That it was a gift for a specific purpose; and that this specific purpose having been entirely given up, Mr. Burns, or his representatives, are entitled to a return of the property.

Now, on the other hand, if it appears, 1. That this is not a free gift, but a sale for a 258 valuable consideration which has *been received by the grantor; on this single ground, then, there must be an end of this claim.

2. If it shall farther appear that it was not even a sale for a specific use, but for the use generally of the United States, there must be an end to all pretension of claim. And the truth of these latter propositions will result from an inspection of the contract, and a steady look at the real character of the case; and at the circumstances out of which the contract grew, and with relation to which it is to be construed.

This was not a gift, but a sale for a valuable consideration which has been paid, and this consideration was twofold. 1. The establishment of a federal city on these lands. 2. The receipt of twenty-five pounds per acre for the reservation.

The establishment of a federal city on the lands. This feature alone distinguishes this case from all others which have been cited from the English or American books.

Was not this a valuable consideration? not an empty, speculative, imaginary consideration, but one real and solid; one which suddenly converted these exhausted and unproductive tobacco fields into mines of almost countless opulence.

The value which was given to the property of former owners is fully shown by the history of the period when the location of the federal city was about to be made. It was in the power of the President to fix the site of the city where he should decide. He could have put it where it now is, or have gone to Georgetown, and there erected the public buildings.

Every public body, and every private individual who in those days touched this subject, has left us proofs of the interest which the land-holders were expected to take and did take in the important question of the precise location of the city; and have thereby borne testimony of the reality and value of the consideration. (Act of Congress of the 16th of July, 1790; Burch's Dig., 226; Act of the Legislature of Maryland of the 19th of December, 1791.)

Suppose the whole of the land on which the 259 city stands *had been purchased by the United States before the location of the city, and paid for by twenty-five pounds per acre out of the public treasury, and such a deed had been taken as that which has been executed—a conveyance in trust to the United States—could the vendor have any color of right to restrict the United States as to any use of the property thus purchased?

Suppose the property had been condemned by inquisition under the law of Maryland to the use of the city of Washington, could it possibly be contended that the former proprietor would retain any control over the property or its application, the land being paid for out of the public treasury? Now, if it be true that if Peters 4.

the property is paid for by the United States, either by voluntary contract or by writ of ad quod damnum, the former proprietor would cease to have any control over it; what is there in the mode of payment which was adopted, and the benefits which he received, to vary the rights of the parties?

It is urged that as the payment was made out of the funds of the ancestor of the complainants, the reservations were virtually free gifts. Now, there was nothing in the case which deserves the name of a free gift, for the establishment of the city was a consideration which produced the whole increased value of the property.

By the parties themselves it was never pretended that these reservations were a gift on the face of the deed itself; they are treated as bargained and sold to the use of the United States; and nothing is pretended to be a donation, except so much as shall remain of the proceeds of the sales of the alternate lots, after the payments for the reservations have been made.

But suppose that the money which was produced by the sales of the lots and was paid for the reservations, is to be considered as a gift of money by the original proprietors, is not money so given as absolutely the property of the United States as if it had been raised by a tax? That such gifts would be made was anticipated by Congress—gifts in consideration of the establishment of the city on the lands of the proprietors.

*But it is said that the proceeds of [260 those lots were a gift of money for a limited purpose; that is, for the purpose of its being applied to pay for these reservations at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre; and these were to be purchased for a specific use, from which the United States have departed by the Act of 1822. Such is not the agreement, nor the deed which was to give effect to the agreement. The agreement is to be taken all together, not distributively.

Mr. Berrien, Attorney General for the United States, stated, that by the Act of Congress of 1822, it was made his official duty to represent the interests of the United States in this case.

The act authorizes the Circuit Court to entertain jurisdiction of a bill in equity in the nature of a petition of right against the United States; to hear and determine upon the claim of the appellants, and to determine what proportion, if any, of the money arising from the sale directed by the act, they are entitled to. The purpose of the government in passing the law is fulfilled by meeting the claim on its merits.

The bill states that the United States had no right, without the consent of the complainants, to dispose of the lands directed to be sold by the law: that such a disposition of them determines the trusts and reverts the property in the original proprietors, or their representatives; or that at their option the trusts originally declared attach to the property so transferred, or to the proceeds arising from the sale.

It is not necessary in this proceeding to consider the question of forfeiture. If such an effect was produced by the Act of 1822, the complainants have their remedy against the purchasers under the act. They have, however, relinquished that ground, and they seek relief against the United States under the special provisions of the law; thus affirming the sale and seeking a dividend of the proceeds of the sale.

But in any view of the case the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine such a claim, and the only question presented for the consideration of this court, and which was 261] *properly before the court below is, whether the complainants, coming in and assenting to the appropriation of the lands made by the Act of 1822, are entitled to a moiety of the proceeds of the sales.

These propositions are maintained on the part of the United States. 1. The legal effect of the conveyance from David Burns to Thomas Beall, of George and John M. Gantt, and by the latter to the commissioners of Washington, was to divest David Burns and his heirs of all right, title, and interest in the several squares or parcels of land selected for the use of the United States.

2. The deed from David Burns to Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt conveyed the legal estate of David Burns to all the lands held by him within the limits of the contemplated city to those persons, "to have and to hold," to them and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor forever, on certain special trusts, among which were the following: to convey to the commissioners of Washington, &c., and their successors to the use of the United States forever, and for the consideration of twenty-five pounds per acre, the lands which are the subject of this controversy; all which they covenanted to do.

In the execution of this trust, and in the fulfillment of their covenant, Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt did convey to the commissioners. The legal title to the lands then became vested in the commissioners, in trust, to hold that portion of them which is now in controversy, for the use of the United States.

In equity the title became absolutely vested in the United States. (1 Eden, 226.) For the limitations of trusts are to be construed the same as those of legal estates. (8 Com. Dig., 1006.)

It was in the eye of equity a grant to the United States forever. Such a grant vests the fee. A grant to the king in perpetuum gives him a fee without the words "heirs" or "successors," for he never dies. So, also, is the law as to a grant to a corporation aggregate. (4 Com. Dig., 12; 2 Bac. Abr., 536.)

If this were not so, the continuance of any 262] right, title, or *interest in David Burns or his heirs was inconsistent with the authority under which the purchase was made; which, being special, created by a public law, and therefore known to the vendor, the conveyances given and received must be construed in reference to it. The Act of Congress under which the purchase was made is to be taken as part of the contract.

The commissioners were authorized to purchase or accept lands within the district for the use of the United States; they were moreover authorized to accept grants of money. Under this latter authority they entered into a contract between the United States and the original proprietors for the division of those building lots.

But it was in the execution of their power to purchase for the use of the United States that they did purchase the reservations selected by the President, and paid for them at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre.

These they were required to purchase for the use of the United States—for their sole use. They were not authorized in relation to these lands to admit any community of interest. They had simply the power to purchase or accept, but in either case, for the use of the United States; not for the joint use of the United States and any other persons. The preliminary agreement expressly negatives the idea of such joint use or joint property in the United States and the former proprietors.

It was a power to purchase for the use of the United States generally, without a specification of the purposes to which the land should be applied, or any limitations whatever upon the direct and absolute dominion which the United States were to acquire by the purchase.

Would an express stipulation that the United States should hold these squares in perpetuity, as such, without power to appropriate them to any purpose, have been pursuant to the authority under which the commissioners acted? They were authorized and directed to purchase such lands as the President should deem proper for the use of the United States. Can such a stipulation be implied from a grant to the use of the United States? But if it could, the implication must be *extended further. [263 From a grant to the use of the United States without qualification, absolutely, and forever, you must imply, 1. That the United States must be forever restrained in the use of the thing granted to the specific purpose to which it was applied at the date of the grant. 2. That a breach of this condition would raise a new trust for the benefit of the United States and the original proprietors or their representatives. It would not operate as a forfeiture, but it would raise a new trust for the joint benefit of the parties, absolute in its terms.

From a grant to the United States a condition is implied, and then a breach of that condition; which, however, does not operate a forfeiture, but serves as the basis of a new trust, to be raised by implication for the joint benefit of the United States and the original proprietors.

3. Construing the contract according to its plain import and intent, there is no equity in the complainants' claim.

The proprietors conveyed to Beall and Gantt certain lands which were to be laid out as a city, with such streets or squares, parcels or lots, as the President of the United States should approve, on certain trusts. 1. To convey to the commissioners of the city of Washington and their successors for the use of the United States forever, all the streets and such of the squares, parcels, and lots, as the President should deem proper, for the use of the United States. 2. Of the residue of the lots, one-half were to be reconveyed to the original proprietors. 3. The other moiety was to be sold under the direction of the President, and the proceeds, after paying twenty-five pounds per acre for the lots, squares, and parcels taken for the use of the United States, were to be paid over to the President as a grant of money to be applied for purposes, and according to the Act of Congress "for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of government of the United States."

The result of this was that the land conveyed, or so much of it as was necessary, being laid out in a city, the United States were to take to their own separate use forever such squares, parcels or lots as the President should prefer, and to pay therefor twenty-five pounds per acre; the remaining 264] ing *lots to be divided between the United States and the original proprietors. The streets were, of course, given up without compensation. One moiety of the remaining lots and any lands not included in the city to be conveyed to the original proprietors, the other moiety to be sold as has been stated.

The appellants pretend that the lots and parcels taken for the use of the United States and paid for at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre, must be retained as squares, or as the sites of public buildings, or for other public works; and cannot be sold to individuals for building lots without entitling the appellants to a moiety of the purchase money.

It is contended that there is no equity in this claim. 1. Because excluding the adseittitious value given to the property of the original proprietors by the location of the city as the seat of government, a full price was paid by government for the land. 2. As against the United States the proprietors have no right to make any claim, on account of this factitious value. 3. Independently of the consideration paid per acre for the lands appropriated to the United States, the proprietors, by the sale of the moiety of the building lots which were reconveyed to them, were liberally compensated for their property. 4. It was expressly denied in the answer, and no contradictory testimony is offered that the lands reserved from the sale and appropriated to the use of the United States were so reserved to be appropriated, or under a pledge to appropriate them to any specific purpose whatever, except the sites of the Capitol and President's house. 5. No such pledge was necessary to secure to the original proprietors an advantageous sale of the moiety of the lots reserved to them; for the interests of the United States concurred in not overstocking the market, as they were entitled to the proceeds of the sales of the other moiety. 6. Such a pledge would have been much more strongly implied in behalf of the purchasers, or individual lot-holders, the value of whose acquisitions might be affected in various ways by laying off the reservations into building lots.

But both and all claims must yield to the right 265] of the *United States to dispose as Congress may think proper of that to which an unconditional title had been acquired, and the interests of all were secured by the consideration that the government had a deeper interest than any individual could have in the prosperity of the city.

7. It was a fund reserved for the future improvements of the city. Improvements would be required, and the quantity reserved proves that this was the object of the reservation.

The Attorney-General then went into an examination of the practice which had prevailed under the acts of Congress, in relation to the city of Washington; and contended that it had Peters 4.

been in accordance with the views of the United States, as now represented by him. He denied that on any occasion a construction different from that which he had given to the contract with the proprietors, and to the laws relative to the city, had ever been assented to by the government, or by their officers.

Mr. Taney, for the appellants, in reply, contended that whatever rights Congress or the government had in the property within the city of Washington, depended on the contract with the original proprietors, and not on their rights of sovereignty. The Act of Maryland of 1791 is the act which was accepted by Congress; and all the rights of sovereignty which can be exercised are derived from that act. They cannot be greater than those which were possessed by the former sovereign who granted them. If the United States accepted a cession with limited powers of sovereignty, they are bound by the limitations. They might have refused the terms, but having accepted them, they are bound by them.

The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall have exclusive legislation; but it does not require that the power shall be despotic or unlimited. It merely excludes the states from all interfering legislation.

The Act of 1791, sec. 2, passed by Maryland, limits the power of Congress, and declares that the cession shall give them no other right in the land than may be transferred by the individuals. All the rights, therefore, which the United States had or have in the soil in the district must have been *acquired by contract. [266 They can acquire none by the exercise of sovereign power, for they have surrendered that portion of sovereignty in this district by accepting it upon the terms stated.

Deriving their rights from contract with the proprietors, under no provision in the same nor under the Act of Cession could they condemn the land for public uses; for that would not be a transfer from the proprietor, but would be to acquire it without a transfer from him, and by a mere act of sovereign power.

If, however, the sovereignty of Congress is not limited by the cession, yet the exercise of despotic power on this subject is restrained by the Constitution; and if the law of 1822 was intended to seize on the private property of individuals and dispose of it for public profit merely for public gain, it would be contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and be void. For if they may take it for such a purpose, they must give the owner of it a fair compensation; and they have no right to fix that compensation at what they may sell it for.

But the seizure of the property of an individual, merely to sell it to another to raise money for any purpose, can hardly be supposed to be authorized by any principles of a free government, and is in manifest opposition to the spirit of the amendment of the Constitution. (2 Dall., 314.)

But the Act of 1822 has no such object. It proposes to sell the right of the United States, and no more. It has no terms to divest the right of the individual owners, and obviously has no such design. It submits these rights to judicial decision, to be tried by the principles of a court of equity. In submitting to such a trial and decision, they place themselves on the ground of contract, and waive any rights their sovereignty might give. For it would be absurd, indeed, to suppose that the United States gave to the court the mere power of hearing a cause, when that hearing could produce no judicial result.

If Congress by mere despotic power might seize and sell this property, without compensation to the owner, and if their will be the only principle of equity by which it is to 267 be decided, then all this controversy authorized by law is nugatory. For in that case we have lost the land by seizure, and we are not entitled to payment for it unless they will it, and as they do not will it in the law, we are sent to this highest tribunal to show rights which have no existence, as they have been extinguished by the despotic power of the sovereignty.

The whole frame of the Act of Congress shows that such is not the meaning of the law. The court are to decide according to the principles of equity; and what the equity may be depends on contract expressed or implied. The government stands before this tribunal as a suitor; having the same rights, and subject to the same rules as an individual.

Assuming the questions in the case to depend on contract:

The agreement between the United States and the proprietors was entered into on the 12th of April, 1791. The deed of conveyance was executed in July, 1791. Before this agreement the site of the city was fixed.

There was no contract as to the location of the city with the proprietors. Everything had been done independently of the proprietors, and without their consent. The agreement was among the proprietors themselves; neither the commissioners nor the President are parties to it. It does not purport to be entered into in consideration of the fixing of the city here, that was done; but expecting immense advantages, they were willing to make liberal return.

The government are not, therefore, purchasers for this consideration. It was merely voluntary on both sides; both parties derived advantages, but not by the contract with one another; and if there was no contract, there was no purchase.

Neither does the twenty-five pounds per acre paid for the public ground constitute them purchasers. The agreement and the deed must be taken together. The United States were not the founders of the city, but the proprietors. The President was authorized by the United States to fix on this site for the seat of the government; and to accept such quantity of land as he should deem proper for the use of the United States. In the plan of the city and 268 in the regulation of the streets, he was the agent of the proprietors, not of the United States. Such was the opinion of Mr. Breckenridge, Attorney-General of the United States. (Burch's Dig. 337.) Squares, public walks, and grounds for gardens, were reserved; not necessary and proper for the use of the United States.

The deed executed by the proprietors conveyed the land absolutely and unconditionally, and without the payment of any consideration. Nothing is required in return; nothing is reserved for the land dedicated to the use of the United States unless it shall be obtained from the sales of the lots to be disposed of under the contract. This is a deduction from the donation of the proprietors. Thus the squares cost the United States nothing.

Had the whole of the land of any of the proprietors been laid out in squares, he would have received nothing for the same. The Act of 1791 confirms this construction of the contract, and was accepted by Congress.

These being the provisions in the deed, the next question is, what is the construction of the instruments by which these contracts were made? Was the absolute and unqualified use given or conveyed; or was the use for public purposes, as distinguished from private property?

And this question mainly depends on another. What was the character of the estate conveyed to Beall and Gantt? If it was a conveyance under the statute of uses, or was an executed trust, the words must receive a technical construction. If an executory trust, it is otherwise. If it is such, is it to be construed by the principles applicable to such contracts? (Preston on Estates, 186, 187; Fearne, 136, 137.) No act of the trustees can change the character of the trust or the rule of construction.

If Beall and Gantt have conveyed a different estate from the one authorized, the conveyance gives no title beyond the trust. And the case is now to be considered as if the Court of Chancery were, in the absence of any conveyance, called on to direct the proper deeds. It is to be executed now as it would have been the day after the contract was made; lapse of time has not altered its meaning.

*Suppose chancery so called on, what 269 would be the stipulations directed in the deed? The objects in view are manifest.

Suppose the government should have abandoned Washington and fixed itself elsewhere, would they have been allowed to sell the squares? Suppose they abandon it in part instead of the whole, does it alter the principle?

Upon the point that this was an executory trust, Mr. Taney argued that the conveyance to the trustees, Beall and Gantt, and by them to the commissioners, did not vest the legal title to the public squares in the United States, but created a trust for their benefit. The trust being an executory trust, is to be carried into execution according to the intent of the party who created the trust. (Fearne, 124, 136, 137; Preston on Estates, 187, 188.)

The deed from Mr. Burns is not, therefore, to be construed by technical rules, nor the words of it taken according to their strict legal interpretation; if such a construction appears from the whole case to be contrary to the intention of the grantor.

The United States are not asserting a legal title in directing the squares to be sold. They are exercising a power as cestuis que trust over a trust fund; and the extent of their right in the fund they have submitted to judicial decision. And although the words in the deed of Mr. Burns might, in a conveyance of the legal estate under the statute, be held to pass the absolute and unqualified use in the squares, yet in the interpretation of a trust the court will look to the real intention of the parties, and are not bound by the strict legal meaning of any particular words used in the instrument.

The United States have no rights except by transfer from individuals. (Act of 1791, sec. 3.) In submitting the right to judicial decision, they subject themselves to the rules which govern contracts with individuals.

Expounding the deed of Mr. Burns on these principles, it may be safely assumed that he intended to authorize Beall and Gantt to convey to the commissioners the squares and streets, for the purposes authorized by the act which fixed on Washington as the seat of government. He did not mean to authorize a conveyance for 270) any other purpose, nor of any *greater estate than the United States desired; for his deed refers to and recites the title of the law of Congress.

The question then is, did the law propose to purchase or accept as a donation the absolute and unqualified interest in the land? or to obtain it for special purposes, and for certain specified uses?

The first proposition supposes that Congress looked forward to a speculation in the land, and expected to gain by the rise of property. This could not have been; and such a presumption is negated by the terms of the acts of Congress.

These different acts of Congress have expounded the meaning of the words, "proper for the use of the United States" in the Act of 1790; and show for what purposes the President was authorized to accept or purchase land. His authority to accept or purchase land being a special one, and for special purposes, he could not accept or purchase for any other purpose; and if he did, the grant would be void. He might accept donations of money, but not of land.

But the proprietor obviously intended to convey for the purposes mentioned in the law and none other.

This is shown by the argument, proposed March, 1791; accepted, April, 1791; and by the deed of June 29, 1791. The deed refers to the Act of Congress, recites its title, and uses the words of the law. Streets are associated with squares, and to be conveyed to the use of the United States.

This being an executory trust, "the court may ascertain the meaning of the grantor," from the nature of the contract and the object of the provision. (1 Prest., 187.)

The object of the proprietor would not have been to allow the President to select all or any of the building lots at this price. He was to be paid out of the sales of the lots. There might not have been lots enough to pay him. Such an intention would have been the surrender of his whole property, without compensation and without motive.

The contract then and now means the same thing; and if such a use of the power of selection, by the President, would have been at that time contrary to the intention of the grantor, it is equally so now.

Yet we are now inquiring what was the intention of the *grantor, and being a trust executory, it is to be executed according to that intention.

It is said that the United States paid its full value. There is no proof of that fact; and the fact is otherwise

Peters 4.

The consideration on which the squares were sold for twenty-five pounds was, that the erection of the public buildings, and the laying out of public walks, &c., would render the city a more agreeable and desirable place of residence, and enhance the price of the lots retained by the proprietor. If he was to retain no lots, or only the refuse lots, it does not by any means follow that he would have taken the twenty-five pounds.

The very case on trial proves that such could not have been the intention of the proprietor. His lots no longer front on a magnificent square. He is cut off from the most public avenue in the city.

The United States are in no sense of the words purchasers. The public squares are in truth, as has been stated, donations from the proprietors.

But if considered as purchasers, they yet purchase for a specific purpose, and having made the contract, they cannot depart from it. They cannot violate their contract. (5 Wheat., 642, 684, 695.)

The grantor is entitled to the execution of his contract, whether he does or does not receive a consideration for it. And it matters not whether his contract is express or implied; whether by way of trust or in any other manner, as by mere dedication to public uses.

In the case of a road or street, the same interest passes to the public, and the same remains in the proprietor. Whether he is paid for it or not, no more passes than the party intended to grant. And if these squares were granted for specific public uses, and not to be converted into private property, that trust, whether created for a valuable consideration or not, must be executed according to the intention of the grantor.

The contract is one entire contract; and being executed in part, must be executed throughout. Being an executory trust, it must be executed according to the intention of the parties, *whether made for a valuable [272 consideration or not. Marriage is a valuable consideration, and is one class of the easements in which this principle is most commonly applied.

Suppose a chancery court now called on by the United States to compel the trustees to execute the legal conveyances, what would be the conditions and covenants? Would not the squares be made to revert to the grantor when the uses ceased?

The lots were pure donations, and equity would not extend the gift farther than the contract. It did not extend to squares.

Assuming that the public squares were granted for specific public purposes, as has been stated, the United States were the cestuis que trust for such purposes and none others. The United States had a right to erect public buildings on them, and to make them public walks or gardens; they were so far cestuis que trust; they were not trustees for others.

As this was a trust for the benefit of the United States, they had a right to renounce it.

The proprietors could not compel them to erect the public edifices, or to lay out and ornament the public grounds. They had not bound themselves by contract to do so; they might or might not do it at their pleasure. And they might renounce the trust intended for their benefit, and the trust would then end; it would be extinguished.

The Act of 1822 is a renunciation of the trust. They, the cestuis que trust, declare that they will not use it for the specific purposes for which it was conveyed. It is not a forfeiture. It is admitted that a trust is not forfeited by its abuse; it is not claimed as a forfeiture, but having renounced it, the trust, in their favor, by directing it to be converted into private property, to whom does the property belong? It goes to the heirs of the grantor. (4 Ves., 60; 9 Ves., 399; 5 Har. & Johns., 400; 4 Wheat., 39; Append., 15.)

If the power exists anywhere, either in Congress or elsewhere, to convert these squares into building lots and private property under the provisions of the original agreement and deed, then, as soon as that power is exercised and the 273] *property so converted, the provisions and stipulations of that agreement attach upon it, and the original proprietor is entitled to the one-half; for whether the power given to lay off the building lots was exercised sooner or later, can make no difference.

If under the agreement and deed the power can be rightfully exercised, the consequence of that exercise of power must follow; and the original proprietor is entitled to one-half of the lots so laid off, under and by virtue of his agreement. The Act of 1822 is obviously framed on this interpretation of the contract. It directs the corporation to sell the right of the United States, and then provides for a decision on these rights.

Congress obviously supposed, when passing the law, that the United States had a right in these lots. And if they had the power to convert the squares into private property under the original agreement and trust, then they would have been tenants in common with the proprietor, and entitled to sell the half and receive the proceeds.

Upon the whole, if the United States had only the right to use these squares for specified purposes, and no right to change the use, if they were merely cestuis que trust, they have renounced the trust, and the whole belongs to the original proprietors—it reverts to the donor or grantor.

If, on the contrary, they have the right to change the plan of the city and convert the squares into building lots, then, whenever this is done by a competent authority acting under the contract, the proprietors are entitled to a conveyance of one-half of the lots.

The relief: In either view of the case the relief is complete against the corporation.

If the United States could not sell the half, or could not sell the whole, they could give no right to the corporation to do so; and we were entitled to a perpetual injunction against them. (9 Wheat., 739.)

If the law of Congress does not authorize the court to decree against the United States as to the land itself, but only as to the money received on sale, then the bill may be dismissed 274] *against them and a perpetual injunction decreed against the corporation.

The great object is to have the rights of the parties adjusted, and no doubt can be entertained that Congress will faithfully carry into execution the principles settled by this court.

But the law of Congress gives the court power to decree against the United States as to the land as well as the money. The Act of 1822, sec. 6, authorizes the party to set out in his bill his title to the land. His bill, therefore, brings that question directly before the court for decision, and imposes upon them the duty of deciding it; and if they must decide it, it follows that they must give the appropriate relief. And if the court come to the conclusion that Congress had no right to sell the land, they can have no right to compel the party to accept money in lieu of it.

The eighth section of the act is only an enlargement of the power of the court. The proprietors might have assented to the sale, and offered to ratify it and accept the proceeds.

The law of 1822 provided for this contingency in the eighth section. It enabled the court to dispose finally of the case, in whatever shape it should be presented to them.

Finally, it is a question between the government and an individual on a subject of the most interesting character. How far may the government, by a new act of legislation, deprive him of his rights of property, and of the remedy to assert them? On such a question it may be assumed as certain that the rights of the individual, whatever they may be, will be protected by this court. It is peculiarly one of those questions on which Congress, with the best dispositions, are most liable to error. It is out of the usual scope of legislation. They cannot be expected to engage in a minute investigation of titles. And they ought not to be held to have exercised wilfully a despotic power; even if they possess it, for the purpose of depriving a private citizen of a full and adequate remedy for the wrong done him.

The Act of 1882 is in a very different spirit, and requires the rights of the party to be decided by the terms of the contract, and not by power.

*As to the forms of this proceeding, it [275 is hardly necessary to discuss them. It is the great object of all parties to understand their rights, and that is the great purpose of the whole proceeding. Enough appears on the record to enable the court to decide on these. There does not appear, however, any well-founded objection that can interfere with the relief we ask.

Mr. Justice STONY delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington, upon a bill in equity, in which the appellants were original complainants.

On the 7th of May, 1822, Congress passed an Act to authorize and empower the corporation of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to drain the low grounds on and near the public reservations, and to improve and ornament certain parts of such reservations. By that act the corporations were among other things to change, by contract with the proprietors of the canal, the location of such parts of the canal passing through the city as lay between Second and Seventh streets, west, into such course as should most effectually, in their opinion, drain and dry the low ground lying on the borders of Tiber Creek; and to effectuate this object, the corporation were further authorized; after having extended the public reservation designated on the plan of the city as number ten, so as the whole south side should bind on the line of Pennsylvania Avenue, and after having caused to be divided the said public reservation number ten, and also the public reservations numbers eleven and twelve into building lots; to sell and dispose of the right of the United States of, in and to, the said lots, or any number thereof, laid off as aforesaid, at public sale, &c., &c. And the corporation was further authorized to cause to be laid off, in such manner as the President should approve, two squares south of Pennsylvania Avenue, &c.; and also to lay off north of Maryland Avenue two uniform and correspondent squares; and the said four squares, when so laid off, to divide into building lots; and to sell 276 and dispose of the *right of the United States in such lots, &c., &c. The proceeds of these sales were in the first place to be applied to the purposes above mentioned, and in the next place to inclosing, planting, or otherwise improving certain public reservations, and building certain bridges, &c., &c.; and the surplus, if any, to go into the national treasury. The sixth section of the act then provides "that it shall be lawful for the legal representatives of any former proprietor of the land directed to be disposed of by this act, or persons lawfully claiming title under them, and they are hereby permitted and authorized, at any time within one year from the passing of this act, to institute a bill in equity, in the nature of a petition of right, against the United States, in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in which they may set forth the grounds of their claim to the land in question." The seventh section provides for the service of process upon, and the appearance of the Attorney-General, &c. The eighth section provides "that the said suit shall be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity. And the said court shall have full power and authority to hear and determine upon the claim of the plaintiff or plaintiffs, and what proportion, if any, of the money arising from the sale of the land hereby directed to be sold, the parties may be entitled to." The ninth and last section of the act provides for an appeal to this court.

The plaintiffs filed their bill in the present case within the time prescribed by the act making the United States and the corporation of the city of Washington parties. They claim title to the lands in controversy, which have been laid off into lots for sale, under David Burns, one of the original proprietors of the city, and of whom the plaintiff Marcia is the only daughter and heir. These lots embrace part of the reservations above referred to, and also a part of the street called B, according to the original plan of the city. The ground of the bill is, that by the original contract of the government with the proprietors, upon the laying out of the city, these reservations and streets were forever to remain for public use, and were incapable, without the consent of the proprietors, of being otherwise appropriated or 277 sold for private use; that the Act of 1822 authorizing such sale is a violation of the contract; that by such sale or appropriation for private use the right of the United States thereto was determined; or that the original proprietors re acquired a right to consider them in the same predicament as if originally laid out for building lots; or that, at all events, they were entitled, in equity, to the whole or a moiety of the proceeds of the sale, if the Act of 1822 were valid for the purposes which it professed to have in view.

Some difficulty has arisen at the argument from the peculiar structure of the bill; it professing in some parts to seek relief under the Act of 1822, and in other parts insisting upon a title inconsistent with it, and demanding an injunction to prevent all sales of the land by the corporation. The opinion of this court certainly is, that under the Act of 1822 the plaintiffs can proceed by a bill in equity in the nature of a petition of right against these the United States only for the money arising from the sales, and cannot claim a decree for the land itself, or for any injunction against sales of it.

The view, however, of the case which we are disposed to take, renders it unnecessary to consider whether the bill is so framed that with reference to the Act of 1822 the court could pass a definitive decree against the United States upon it, from the incongruities alluded to.

As it is manifestly the interest and desire of all the parties to have an opinion upon the merits, so as to put an end to the controversy, we shall waive all consideration of minor objections and proceed at once to the consideration of the substantial ground of the claim.

Congress, by an Act, passed on the 16th of July, 1790, provided that a district of territory not exceeding ten miles square, to be located as therein directed, on the River Potomac, at some space between the mouths of the Eastern Branch and Conogochague be, and the same was thereby accepted for the permanent seat of the government of the United States. Three commissioners were by the same act to be appointed, to survey, and by proper metes and bounds to define and limit the district; and they were authorized to purchase or accept such quantity of land on the eastern side *of [278 the said river within the said district as the President should deem proper for the use of the United States; and according to such plans as the President should approve, the commissioners were to provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress and of the President and for the public offices of the government of the United States. A subsequent act, passed on the 3d of March, 1791, authorized some alterations of the limits of the district. Suitable cessions of the jurisdiction and soil of the territory, subject to the private rights of property of the inhabitants, were made by the States of Maryland and Virginia.¹ And the former act further provided for the removal of the seat of government to the district on the first Monday of December, 1800. The limits of the district were accordingly ascertained and defined, as made known by the proclamations of the President of the 24th of January and the 30th of March, 1791.

As yet no public designation had been made of the site of the federal city which was contemplated to be laid out within the limits of the district, nor of the places on which the public buildings should be erected; nor, indeed, had there been any purchase or donation from any of the proprietors of lands within the district, by or to the commissioners for that object. There cannot, however, be a question that various negotiations had been entered into with the proprietors, and informal proposals made by them with a view to obtain so important and valuable a boon as the location of the city within the boundaries of their estates. And it can admit of as little question, that preparatory steps had been taken on the part of the government to procure suitable plans for the laying out of the metropolis.

In this state of things nineteen of the proprietors of the land constituting the present site of the city of Washington (among whom was David Burns), on the 30th of March, 1791, entered into an agreement, which was presented 279 to the commissioners *as the basis of the terms on which they were willing to dedicate their lands for the location of the city. The agreement was accepted by the commissioners and recorded in their books. It is in the following terms: "We, the subscribers, in consideration of the great benefits we expect to derive from having the federal city laid off upon our lands, do hereby agree and bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, to convey in trust to the President of the United States or commissioners, or such persons as he shall appoint, by good and sufficient deeds, in fee-simple, the whole of our respective lands, which he may think proper to include within the lines of the federal city, for the purposes and on the conditions following: The President shall have the sole power of directing the federal city to be laid off in what manner he pleases. He may retain any number of squares he may think proper, for public improvements or other public uses; and the lots only which shall be laid off, shall be a joint property between the trustees in behalf of the public and each present proprietor. And the same shall be fairly and equally divided between the public and the individuals, as soon as may be after the city shall be laid off. For the streets, the proprietors shall receive no compensation; but for the squares or lands, in any form, which shall be taken for public buildings, or any kind of public improvements or uses, the proprietors, whose lands are taken, shall receive at the rate of twenty-five pounds per acre, to be paid by the public." There are some minor arrangements as to growing timber, grave-yards, &c., which are not necessary to be mentioned. It is material, however, to observe that no time or mode of payment is prescribed in the agreement of the twenty-five pounds per acre; and no fund out of which it was to be paid is designated. The agreement was merely preparatory, and to be carried into effect by formal conveyances.

Now, it is upon the terms of this agreement that the plaintiffs assert their title to relief in the present case. They contend that though the whole land was to be conveyed, yet the portion of it which should be taken for streets and public reservations, according to the plan approved by the President, was clothed with a perpetual condition or trust that *they [280] should forever remain streets and public reservations, and never should be liable to be appropriated to any private use, or changed from their original public purpose. That upon any such change or appropriation the title reverted to the original proprietors, or, at all events, was to be disposed of and divided between them in the manner provided for in respect to the land laid off into lots. They also contend that the land so diverted to streets and public reservations was a mere donation from the proprietors, and not a purchase by the United States; and, therefore, ought to be governed by the rules applicable to public charities, and the trust strictly construed and enforced.

It is not very material, in our opinion, to decide what was the technical character of the grants made to the government—whether they are to be deemed mere donations or purchases. The grants were made for the foundation of a federal city, and the public faith was necessarily pledged when the grants were accepted to found such city. The very agreement to found a city was of itself a most valuable consideration for these grants. It changed the nature and value of the property of the proprietors to an almost incalculable extent. The land was no longer to be devoted to mere agricultural purposes, but acquired the extraordinary value of city lots. In proportion to the success of the city would be the enhancement of its value, and it required scarcely any aid from the imagination to foresee that this act of the government would soon convert the narrow income of farms into solid opulence. The proprietors so considered it. In this very agreement they state the motive of their proceedings in a plain and intelligible manner. It is not a mere gratuitous donation from motives of generosity or public spirit; but in consideration of the great benefits they expect to derive from having the federal city laid off upon their lands. For the streets they were to receive no compensation. Why? Because those streets would be of as much benefit to themselves, as lot-holders, as to the public. They were to receive twenty-five pounds per acre for the public reservation: "to be paid" (as the agreement states it) "by the public." They understood themselves, then, to *receive payment from the public [281] for the reservations. It makes no difference that by the subsequent arrangements they were to receive this payment out of the sales of the lots which they had agreed to convey to the public, in consideration of the government's founding the city on their lands. It was still contemplated by them as a compensation, as a valuable consideration, fully adequate to the value of all their grants. It can, therefore, be treated in no other manner than as a bargain between themselves and the government, for what each deemed an adequate consideration. Neither considered it a case where all was benefit on one side and all sacrifice on the other. It was, in no just sense, a case of charity, and was never so treated in the negotiations of the parties. But, as has been already said, it is not in our view material, whether it be considered as a donation or a purchase, for in each case it was for the foundation of a city.

And in construing this agreement, this fact should never be lost sight of. It is obvious that the proprietors or their heirs could not be presumed for any great length of time to have any interest in the streets or public reservations beyond that of other inhabitants. If the city became populous, the lots would be sold and built upon, and in the lapse of one or two generations, at most, the title of the original proprietors might well be presumed to be extinguished by sales or otherwise; so that the interest of themselves or their heirs in the streets and reservations would not be distinguishable from that of other citizens. They must have also contemplated that a municipal corporation must soon be created to manage the concerns, and police, and public interests of the city; and that such a corporation would and ought to possess the ordinary powers for municipal purposes which are usually confined to such corporate bodies. Among these are certainly the authority to widen or alter streets, and to manage, and in many instances to dispose of public property, or vary its appropriation.

They might, and indeed must, also have placed a just confidence in the government, that in founding the city it would do no act which would obstruct its prosperity, or interfere with its great fundamental objects or 282 interests. It could *never be supposed that Congress would seek to destroy what its own legislation had created and fostered into being.

On the other hand, it must have been as obvious that as Congress must forever have an interest to protect and aid the city, it would for this very purpose be most impolitic and inconvenient to lay any obstructions to the most free exercise of its power over it. The city was designed to last in perpetuity—capitoli immobile saxum. No human foresight could take in the great variety of events which might render great changes in the plan, form, and location of the city indispensable for the health, the comfort, and the prosperity of the city. Cases might easily be imagined, as in other cities, where the desolations of fire have made alterations in the streets and public squares of a city, most important and valuable to the whole community. A prohibition, which should forever close up the legislative power of Congress on such a subject, under all circumstances, ought not lightly to be presumed nor readily admitted. It should be proved by the most direct and authentic documents, before we should admit the belief that the wisdom of the first President of the United States yielded up such a valuable franchise.

If the case had stood solely upon this preparatory agreement as an executory contract, there might have been stronger grounds to impose limitations upon the grant of the streets and public reservations. The language of the instrument is, that the President may retain any number of squares he may think proper for public improvements or other public uses. Yet, even then, the appropriation of these squares for public uses would not necessarily carry with it an implied obligation that they should forever remain dedicated to those uses, and to none other. If such had been the intention of the parties, we should naturally expect to find there some direct expression of it, some acknowledgment of the obligation, or some condition carrying it to such a political mortmain. If the stipulation was so important and valuable as is now contended for, and constituted an object of permanent solicitude, it would scarcely escape the notice of the proprietors in laying down the fundamental basis of their cessions. If it did then escape them, we *should have reason to look [283 for its incorporation into the more solemn instruments which were contemplated thereafter to be executed by the parties, and were, in fact, executed by them in fulfillment of their original agreement. But no such stipulation is there to be found.

On the 29th June, 1791, the proprietors severally executed deeds of indenture to consummate the agreement of the preceding March. They are all in the same form, and contain the same declarations of trust. That executed by David Burns conveys to Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt (the trustees designated by the president) all the lands of the proprietor within the bounds of the city upon the following trusts, viz., "that all the said lands, &c., as may be thought necessary or proper to be laid out together with other lands within the said limits for the federal city, with such streets, squares, parcels and lots as the President of the United States, for the time being, shall approve; and that the said (the trustees) &c., shall convey to the commissioners for the time being appointed by virtue of the Act of Congress, entitled, &c., and their successors for the use of the United States forever, all the said streets, and such of the said squares, parcels and lots, as the President shall deem proper for the use of the United States; and that as to the residue of the said lots into which the lands, &c., shall be divided, a fair and equal division of them shall be made; and if no other mode of division shall be agreed on by consent of the said (grantor) and the commissioners for the time being, then such residue of the said lots shall be divided, every other lot alternate, to the said (grantor) &c., and all the said lots which may in any manner be divided or assigned to the said (grantor) shall thereupon, &c., be conveyed by the said (trustees) to the said (grantor), his heirs and assigns; and that the said other lots shall and may be sold at such time, &c., &c., as the President of the United States for the time being shall direct; and that the said (trustees) &c., will, on the order and direction of the President, convey all the lots so sold, and ordered to be conveyed, to the respective purchasers in fee-simple, &c., &c.

Provision is then made that the twenty-five pounds per acre *to be paid by the [284 United States for the squares, should be paid out of the proceeds of such sales, and the residue shall be paid to the President as a grant of money to be applied for the purposes, and according to the Act of Congress.

Provision is also made for other objects, not material to be mentioned, and for a conveyance of the trust property to such other persons as the President might thereafter direct, in fee; "subject to the trusts then remaining to be executed, and to the end that the same may be perfected." In pursuance of this last provision,

Beall and Gantt, the trustees, made a conveyance of the premises by an indenture dated the 30th of November, 1896, to certain commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress, subject to the trusts then remaining to be executed; and, among other things, conveyed to the commissioners all that part of the lands, &c., which had been laid off into squares, parcels, or lots for buildings, and now remaining so laid off in the city of Washington.

Now, it is important to observe that the object of the indenture to Beall and Gantt in 1791 was to carry into full and entire effect the preliminary agreement entered into by the proprietors. There is no pretense to say that that indenture has not fully carried that agreement into effect. There is no allegation in the bill of any mistake in the draft of the indenture, or that the instrument was not precisely what the parties intended it should be. The argument at the bar has not attempted to set up any such mistake as a ground of equity. And, indeed, after such a lapse of time and acquiescence in its legal accuracy and sufficiency by all the parties, and after so many acts done under it which have been silently confirmed by the parties, it would be impossible to insist upon any such mistake with a chance of success. We must take the indenture, therefore, as we find it, as a complete execution of the preliminary agreement, and as expressing the true intent and definitive objects of the parties. The preliminary agreement, then, became, upon the execution of the indenture, functus officio, and was merged in the more formal and solemn stipulations of the latter. It was no longer executory, but executed. The indenture itself contained many executory trusts; and so far as 285] any of them *yet remain unexecuted, the instrument itself may still be denominated executory. But so far as the trusts have been fulfilled, as by the conveyance of lots to the grantors or to purchasers, and especially by the conveyance of the streets and squares, &c., to the commissioners in 1796, the indenture can no longer be deemed executory. Its functions have been final and complete.

We need not, therefore, inquire into the distinction taken in a court of chancery between executory and executed agreements, or into the extent to which its equitable jurisdiction will be interposed to reform instruments upon grounds of mistake, or to grant other relief; because the present bill presents no case falling under either predicament. Here we have a solemn instrument embodying the final intentions and agreements of the parties without any allegation of mistake, and we are to construe that instrument according to the legal import of its terms.

Now, upon such legal import, there do not seem grounds for any reasonable doubt. The streets and public squares are declared to be conveyed "for the use of the United States forever." These are the very words which by law are required to vest an absolute unconditional fee-simple in the United States. They are the appropriate terms of art, if we may so say, to express an unlimited use in the government. If the government were to purchase a lot of land for any general purpose, they are the very words which the conveyance would adopt in order to grant an unlimited fee to the use of the government. There are no other words or references in the instrument which control in any manner the natural meaning of them. There are no objects avowed on the face of it which imply any limitation. How, then, can the court defeat the legal meaning, and resort to a conjectural intent?

It has been said that by looking at the preliminary agreement the court will see that terms of a more limited nature are there used. Be it so. But will that justify the court in resorting to it to explain or limit the legal import of words in a solemn instrument which contains no reference to it? If we could resort to it, the natural conclusion would be, in the *absence of all contrary proof, that the 286 last instrument embodied the real intent of the parties; that the preliminary agreement either imperfectly expressed their intent, or was designedly modified in the final act. The general rule of law is that all preliminary negotiations and agreements are to be deemed merged in the final, settled instruments executed by the parties, unless a clear mistake be established. In this very case it may be true, for aught that appears, that the President might have insisted upon the introduction into the trust deed of the very words in controversy—to the use of the United States forever—in order to avoid the ambiguity of the words of the preliminary agreement. He may have required an unlimited conveyance to the United States so that they might be unfettered in any future arrangements for the promotion of the health, the comfort, or the prosperity of the city. But it is sufficient for us that here there is a solemn conveyance which purports to grant an unlimited fee in the streets and squares to the use of the United States, and we know of no authority which would justify us in disregarding the terms or limiting their import, where no mistake is set up and none is established. It would, indeed, be almost incredible that any substantive mistake should have existed and never have been brought to the notice of the trustees or to that of the commissioners, upon their succeeding to the trust, or seriously insisted on by any party, down to the time of filing the present bill. The present is not a bill to reform a contract or deed, but to assert rights supposed to grow out of the trusts declared in the deed.

This view of the matter renders it unnecessary for the court to go into an examination of the facts insisted upon in the answer to repel the allegations in the bill, or to disprove the equity which it asserts. If the United States possess, as we think they do, an unqualified fee in the streets and squares, that defeats the title of the plaintiffs and definitively disposes of the merits of the cause.

It is the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Baldwin dissenting, that the decree of the Circuit Court, dismissing the bill, be affirmed with costs.

287*] *FRANCIS LAGRANGE, ALIAS ISIDORE, a man of color, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
PIERRE CHOUTEAU, JUN.

Decision of Supreme Court of Missouri—writ of Error—practice—jurisdiction.

After the decision of the case in the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, the plaintiff presented a petition for a re-hearing, claiming his freedom under the provisions of the Ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States north-west of the River Ohio. The Supreme Court refused to grant the re-hearing, and the plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error to this court under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789. Held, that as the petition for re-hearing forms no part of the record it cannot be noticed. The jurisdiction of this court depends on the matter disclosed in the bill of exceptions.

ERROR from the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

An action of trespass vi et armis was brought in the State Circuit Court of the County of St. Louis, State of Missouri, by the plaintiff in error, a man of color, against Pierre Chouteau, the defendant, for the purpose of trying his right to freedom. The judgment of the Circuit Court was against the plaintiff; and on an appeal to the Supreme Court of Missouri, that judgment was affirmed.

The case was brought before this court by writ of error to the Supreme Court of Missouri, under the twenty-fifth section of the Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, passed on the 29th of September, 1789.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Kane, for the defendant in error, objected to the court taking jurisdiction of the case, as it did not come within the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of the Act of Congress.

It could not be found, on the most careful examination of the record, that the construction of any act of Congress had been brought into question in the courts of Missouri where the suit was originally entertained. All the questions in the case before those courts might have been and were decided without reference to the Act of Congress. The claim to freedom asserted by the plaintiff was left to the jury by the court before which it was tried, and if in any of the 288*] instructions *given by the court, reference to the Ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, can be supposed to have been made, the construction given by the court to that ordinance was in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Mr. Lawless, for the plaintiff in error, argued that as the provisions of the twenty-fifth section do not declare in what stage of the proceedings the construction of an act of Congress shall have been questioned to give this court jurisdiction; the refusal of the Supreme Court of Missouri to allow to the plaintiff a re-hearing, he having petitioned for the same, alleging his right to freedom under the ordinance, made this a case for the cognizance of this court. (Cited, Hickie et al. v. Starke et al., 1 Peters, 94.)

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:
Peters 4.

This was an action of trespass vi et armis brought by the plaintiff against the defendant in the Circuit Court for the County of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, for the purpose of trying the right of the plaintiff to freedom.

The general issue was pleaded, and a verdict found for the defendant. The judgment on this verdict was carried by appeal to the Supreme Court for the Third Judicial District, where it was affirmed. This judgment has been brought into this court by writ of error.

The pleadings do not show that any act of Congress was drawn into question, but the counsel for the plaintiff has read a petition for a re-hearing, which sets forth a claim to freedom under the Ordinance of Congress passed on the 13th of July, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States north-west of the River Ohio. But as a petition for re-hearing forms no part of the record, it cannot be noticed. The jurisdiction of the court depends on the matter disclosed in the bill of exceptions.

At the trial the plaintiff proved that Pascal Carré, in 1816, was desirous of selling the plaintiff, who was then his slave, and the defendant wished to purchase him. The offer of the defendant was declined, because the witness was *desirous of selling the slave to some [289 person who would take him out of St. Louis. Some time afterwards he sold the slave to Pierre Menard, a resident of Kaskaskia, in the State of Illinois, for the sum of five hundred dollars.

Pierre Menard deposed that some time in the year 1816, Pascal Carré offered to sell the plaintiff to him; which proposition was rejected because he resided in Illinois, where slavery was not tolerated. On understanding that the defendant was desirous of purchasing a slave, the witness informed him that Mr. Carré had one for sale; but the defendant replied that Carré would not sell the slave to him, because he resided in St. Louis. It was suggested by Mr. Berthold that the witness might purchase the slave for Mr. Chouteau; which witness declined doing, because it would be treating his friend Carré incorrectly. He, however, ultimately agreed to buy the said slave for Mr. Chouteau, take him down the river, and keep him there some months, and then deliver him to the defendant. He accordingly bought the slave, took him to St. Genevieve in Missouri, and put him to work at mine La Motte, with some other hands. Some time afterwards he was sent to Kaskaskia and put on board a keel-boat as a hand. After remaining there about two days, he went in the boat to New Orleans, whence he returned to Kaskaskia about the 30th of March, 1817, as a hand in the boat. After remaining a few days for the purpose of unlading the boat, he was sent in her to the Big Swamp in Girardeau County, State of Missouri, where he remained five or six weeks; after which he returned in the boat to Kaskaskia, from which place, after two or three days, he was sent to St. Louis and delivered to the defendant, who returned to the witness the five hundred dollars he had advanced for him. The witness stated that he purchased the said slave for the defendant, and not for himself, and that he never intended to make Kaskaskia the place of his (the slave's) residence. Some other testimony substantially proving the same fact was introduced by the parties.

Upon this testimony the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury:

1. That if they shall be of opinion that the plaintiff remained in the State of Illinois with 290 the person who purchased *him, and who was a resident of the said State, they must find for the plaintiff. The instruction was refused.

2. That the right of the plaintiff to his freedom is not affected by any secret trust or understanding between the person who purchased and brought him to Illinois and any other person whatsoever. This also was refused.

3. That if the jury shall be of opinion that the plaintiff was, during any time, lawfully a resident of the State of Illinois, and in the service of a citizen of that State, claiming property in, and owner of the said plaintiff, they shall find for the plaintiff. This instruction was given.

4. That if the jury shall be of opinion that the plaintiff was sold absolutely by a citizen of the State of Missouri to a citizen of the State of Illinois, and belonged under such sale to such purchaser, no secret understanding between said purchaser and a third person shall affect the rights which the plaintiff may otherwise have to his liberty, as a consequence of his residence in the State of Illinois. The court refused to give this instruction as asked, but did instruct the jury that if they believed the plaintiff was bought by Colonel Menard for his own use, and taken to Illinois and kept there with the intention to make that his permanent place of residence, they ought to find for the plaintiff.

The counsel for the plaintiff excepted to the opinions given by the court, and to its refusal to give those which were asked.

The right of the plaintiff to liberty was supposed by the court to depend on the question of his being purchased in fact by a citizen of Illinois, and on his being carried to Illinois with a view to a residence in that State. The facts were left to the jury, and found for the defendant. It is not perceived that any act of Congress has been misconstrued. The court is therefore of opinion that it has no jurisdiction of the case.

The writ of error is dismissed; and the cause remanded to the Supreme Court for the Third Judicial District of Missouri, that the judgment may be affirmed.

291*] *JOHN CONARD, Marshal of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

FRANCIS H. NICOLL, Defendant in Error.

Seizure of ships and goods by United States marshal on fieri facias—respondentia bond—Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. confirmed.

The principles decided in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, relative to the priority of the United States, examined and confirmed. (1)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

1.—1 Peters, 386.

862

The defendant in error brought an action of trespass in the court below against the plaintiff in error for a quantity of merchandise, consisting of teas, cassia, nankeens, &c., all of the value of one hundred and ninety-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-five dollars. Also for four ships, viz., the Addison, the Woodrop Sims, the Thomas Scattergood, and the Benjamin Rush, all of the value of one hundred thousand dollars.

The defendant below pleaded that he, as marshal of the district of Pennsylvania, had a writ of feri facias against one Edward Thomson, in favor of the United States, and that he seized the merchandise and ships as Thomson's property. The plaintiff replied, property in himself, &c., in the common form.

It was agreed between the parties to the suit that the title of Francis H. Nicoll to the property should be tried, the property having been placed in the hands of trustees to abide the event of the suit.

The case was tried in the Circuit Court before Mr. Justice Washington, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff for thirty-nine thousand two hundred and forty-nine dollars and sixty-six cents damages. The defendant in the Circuit Court excepted to the charge of the court, and prosecuted this writ of error. The whole charge delivered to the jury in the Circuit Court was brought up by the writ of error.

By direction of the court the whole of the charge delivered by Mr. Justice Washington in the Circuit Court is inserted as follows:

*This is an action of trespass brought [292 against the marshal of this district for levying an execution at the suit of The United States v. Edward Thomson, on the ships Addison, Woodrop Sims, Benjamin Rush, and Thomas Scattergood, and certain parts of their cargoes, alleged to have been the property of the plaintiff. The defendant justifies his proceedings under the allegation that the property levied upon belonged to Edward Thomson, against whom the execution was sued out.

The evidence given by the plaintiff to prove his title to the property in dispute is substantially as follows: A respondentia bond in the usual form, dated in April, 1825, on a certain part of the outward cargo of the ship Addison, with a memorandum annexed reciting an agreement that the outward bill of lading should be indorsed to the plaintiff as a collateral security for the sum mentioned in the bond, and that the property to be shipped homeward, being the proceeds of the outward cargo, should be for account and risk of Edward Thomson, but to be consigned to order, and the bill of lading for the same to be forwarded to the plaintiff.

2. The bill of lading of the outward cargo, referred to on the bond and memorandum for account and risk of Edward Thomson, indorsed by him in blank, and delivered to the plaintiff.

3. A homeward bill of lading and invoice for account and risk of Edward Thomson, consigned to order, and indorsed by the shipper at Canton, dated in November, 1825; which, upon the arrival of the ship in the spring of 1826, were delivered by Peter Mackie, the head clerk of Edward Thomson before his failure, and afterwards one of his general assignees, to the plaintiff.

The title to the cargoes of the other ships is in all material respects the same with that just stated.

The title to the ships themselves is claimed under bills of sale by Edward Thomson to the plaintiff, dated on the 9th of July and 27th of October, 1825.

On the 19th of November, 1825, Edward Thomson made a general assignment of all his estate to Peter Mackie and Richard Renshaw for the benefit of his creditors.

293*] *The United States having obtained judgments against Edward Thomson to an immense amount, sued out and levied execution on these ships and their cargoes, at the moment of their respective arrivals in the spring and autumn of 1826.

In October, 1826, the whole of this property was restored by the United States to the plaintiff, under an agreement between them that it should be without prejudice to any existing right, and that the plaintiff should sell the same to the best advantage, and should immediately invest the net proceeds in the name of the Secretary of the Treasury in productive stock, and place the certificates thereof in The Bank of the United States, &c.; and that the plaintiff should institute a suit against the marshal to ascertain the right to the said proceeds; in which action, if the plaintiff in his own right, or as representing Smith and Nicoll, should establish his right thereto, then that the said proceeds should be paid to him; otherwise, the same to be paid to the United States. This agreement is recited in the condition of a bond executed by the plaintiff, with sureties to the United States.

An agreement had been previously entered into by the counsel in the cause, dated the 27th of September, 1826, stipulating that the merits only should be litigated, without regard to form.

In the case of The Atlantic Insurance Company v. Conard, a great variety of objections of a legal character to the title of the plaintiff in that cause, which are equally applicable to that of this plaintiff, were stated and overruled by the Supreme Court, and they have of course been abandoned by the defendant's counsel in this cause. They rely, nevertheless, upon other objections, partly legal, but mainly resting upon the particular facts belonging to this case, and which are now to be examined. The duty of the court will be to give to the jury an opinion upon every question of a legal nature which the case presents; and after laying down certain general principles of law applicable to the evidence which has been given, to leave the facts to be decided by the jury.

The first objection to the plaintiff's title is 294*] that the transfers *executed by Edward Thomson to the plaintiff for the property in dispute were given without consideration. It is denied that anything, much less the amount stated in those transfers, was due by Edward Thomson to the plaintiff, or to Smith and Nicoll, at the time they were executed. Upon this point it is proper that the jury should be satisfied; and it is for them to decide upon the evidence whether these securities were given for value received or not; if they were given without consideration, the plaintiff will have failed in establishing his right to the property, which they professed to transfer.

The plaintiff relies upon the following evidence to prove the consideration for which those securities were given: 1. The respondentia bonds and memorandum annexed, both under seal, and both of them acknowledging a loan to Edward Thomson of the sum expressed in them.

2. The negotiable notes of Edward Thomson to the plaintiff, or to Smith and Nicoll, produced in evidence by the plaintiff.

3. A settled account, signed by Mackie, on the part of Edward Thomson, and by Mr. Worthington on that of the Nicolls.

4. Sundry entries in Edward Thomson's memorandum book.

The correspondence between the Nicolls and Edward Thomson is relied upon by the plaintiff as additional proof of the fact, and by the defendant's counsel for the purpose of disproving it.

Upon this evidence the court has only to observe, 1. That even bills of exchange and negotiable notes of hand are prima facie evidence of value received, as well between the original parties as third persons, so as to throw upon the party who denies the fact the burden of disproving it.¹ The presumption is certainly not less strong where the acknowledgment of value received is under the seal of the party. If this be the settled law, as the authorities cited prove it to be, it is not competent to the defendant to shift the burden of proof by giving notice to the plaintiff that *he would be required [295 on the trial to prove that the securities under consideration were given for value received.

2. That a settled account between a creditor and his debtor being proved, is prima facie evidence of the balance stated on it having been due; which may nevertheless be impeached and disproved by pointing out errors in the account, and maintaining their existence.

It is insisted, however, by the defendant's counsel, that the consideration for these securities, admitting it to be proved, flowed from Smith and Nicoll, and that the plaintiff has given no evidence of an assignment by them to him. But, without noticing the agreement between the plaintiff and the United States as to the interest of Smith and Nicoll, represented by the plaintiff, it may be observed, that if the Nicolls and Edward Thomson were contented, and so agreed, that these securities should be given to the plaintiff for debts originally due by Edward Thomson to Smith and Nicoll, it cannot be essential to the plaintiff's recovery in this case, that he should produce a written assignment by Smith and Nicoll to him. If the plaintiff, as between himself and Smith and Nicoll, be not entitled beneficially to the property in dispute, or to its proceeds, that is a matter to be settled between them, and can form no question in this cause. That Edward Thompson assented to this arrangement is proved, prima facie, at least, by the securities themselves; and the objection relied upon cannot with propriety be urged by the United States, who claim the property in dispute as belonging to him.

1.—Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat., 232; Riddle v. Mandeville, 5 Cranch, 322; Chitty on Bills, note 17.

The second objection to the plaintiff's title, and the one mainly relied upon, is that the transactions between the plaintiff, and Smith and Nicoll, and Edward Thomson, upon which the transfers of the property in dispute were founded, were, as they respected the United States, fraudulent and void. Whether they were so or not, will be submitted to the decision of the jury upon the evidence which has been given, after the court has stated some general principles of law to assist them in their investigation.

The first inquiry is, What is fraud? From a view of all that has been said by learned 296 judges and jurists upon this *subject, it may be safely laid down that, to constitute actual fraud between two or more persons to the prejudice of a third, contrivance and design to injure such third person by depriving him of some right or otherwise impairing it, must be shown. In the case of *Chesterfield v. Jansen*¹, Lord Hardwicke terms it dolus malus. Lord Coke defines covin to be a secret assent determined in the hearts of two or more to the defrauding and prejudice of another.² The acts of 13th Eliz., ch. 5; and 27th Eliz., ch. 4, which did little more than affirm the doctrines of the common law, afford substantially the same definition. The case stated by Lord Mansfield in Worsley, &c., v. Demattos, &c.,³ of a person who, knowing that a creditor has obtained judgment against his debtor, buys the debtor's goods, though for a full price, with a view to defeat the execution of the creditor, is a strong illustration of the same principle; the purchase was declared to be fraudulent, not because a man may not lawfully purchase the property of a defendant against whom there is a judgment, but because of the intention with which it was made.

The question, then, for you to decide, will be whether the transactions between these parties, which are alleged to have been fraudulent, were contrived or intended to delay or defeat the United States of the debts due to them by Edward Thomson, or otherwise to prejudice their rights. How far the Nicolls might lawfully take care of their own interests, although by doing so the United States might thereby be prejudiced, will be seen when we come to consider more particularly the alleged instances of fraud which have been relied upon. But previous to this examination it may be proper to lay down the following principles, which seem to be incontrovertible:

1. That actual fraud is not to be presumed, but ought to be proved by the party who alleges it.

2. If the motive and design of an act may be traced to an honest and legitimate source, 297 equally as to a corrupt one, *the former ought to be preferred. This is but a corollary to the preceding principle.

3. If the person against whom fraud is alleged should be proved to have been guilty of it in any number of instances, still, if the particular act sought to be avoided be not shown to be tainted with fraud, it cannot be affected by those other frauds, unless in some way or other it be connected with or form a part of them.

1.—2 Ves., 155.

2.—Co. Lit., 357, c.

3.—1 Bur., 474; See also Cadogan v. Kennet, Cowp., 434.

It may be proper in this place to observe, in relation to the frauds alleged to have been committed by Bailey and Edward Thomson to the prejudice of the United States, that they cannot affect the rights of the plaintiff or of Smith and Nicoll, unless it be proved to your satisfaction that Bailey was at the time he committed them the general agent of those parties, or that he committed them in some transaction within the scope of a special agency, and in connection with or otherwise affecting these securities.

The first instance of alleged fraud by the plaintiff or by Smith and Nicoll, is the taking of these securities from a man known by those persons to be a debtor to the United States, and believed by them to be in a state of insolvency.

But this is not a fraud even in England, unless the security be given in contemplation or on the eve of bankruptcy, and unless the assignment or transfer in favor of such preferred creditor or creditors exhaust the whole estate of the debtor, or approach so near as that the exception is merely colorable.⁴ But in a case where the bankrupt law does not apply, there can be no doubt that a debtor may lawfully give a preference to a particular creditor or set of creditors; if there be a delivery of possession where it can be done, although his other creditors may thereby be hindered or delayed in payment of their debts. The case of *Holbird v. Anderson*⁵ is a strong case in support of this principle. How far the right of preference of the United States can be affected by an assignment of their debtor for the benefit of his creditors, will be considered under another head.

*The other instances of alleged fraud [298 are:

2. Alteration in the form of the memorandum to the respondentia bonds, thereby making the homeward cargoes deliverable to order.

3. Taking bills of sales of Edward Thomson's vessels by the plaintiff or by Smith and Nicoll, surrendering them on arrival of the vessels and then taking new ones; practiced by those persons in repeated instances prior to the year 1825.

4. Having on board these vessels on their arrival double papers; that is to say, a general bill of lading of the whole homeward cargo, and also several bills of lading of the parts covered by the respondentia bonds and outward bills of lading.

5. Upholding the credit of Edward Thomson by the Nicolls, although the desperate state of his affairs was known to them.

6. Antedating the respondentia bonds to make them conform to the outward bills of lading.

7. Want of possession of the vessels and cargoes covered by the plaintiff's securities.

Lastly, the persuasions used by the Nicolls to induce Edward Thomson to trade on the credit for duties allowed by the United States.

4.—1 Bur., 478-481.

5.—5 T. Rep., 235; See also 8 T. Rep., 521.

It may be sufficient for the present to observe, generally, that these acts, nor either of them, although they should be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, are or is, per se, fraudulent. This, it is believed, may be satisfactorily shown by a more particular consideration of these acts of alleged fraud.

1. As to the alteration in the form of the memorandum, it will be sufficient to observe that no principle of law has been referred to or case cited to countenance this objection. It would on the contrary seem to have been strictly correct to make the alteration in a case where the outward and homeward cargoes were transferred, not absolutely, but merely as collateral security, if the debt for which they were pledged should not be paid on the arrival of the vessel, or be otherwise secured according to the stipulations of the bond.

2. As to the practice of the plaintiff and of Smith and Nicoll prior to the year 1825, in 299*] surrendering the bills of sale *which they had obtained of Edward Thomson's vessels upon their arrival, and then renewing them as soon as those vessels had been entered; should it be admitted (which I am not to be understood as admitting) to have been fraudulent as it concerned the United States, it is not easy to perceive how it can be made to infect with fraud the bills of sale made to the plaintiff in July and October, 1825; which never were surrendered, but, on the contrary, were used as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim to the possession of the vessels, which they respectively conveyed immediately on their arrival in 1826. If there has been any evidence given to connect these transactions together, so as to bring them within the operation of one of the principles before mentioned, the jury will judge of it.

3. As to the double papers on board of these vessels, the question is, were they contrived with a view to defraud the United States of the duties on the cargoes of those vessels, or may not a legitimate purpose for the use of them be fairly presumed? Let it always be kept in mind that these cargoes were not sold to the plaintiff, but were merely pledged as collateral security. If on their arrival they were redeemed, they would then become the absolute property of Edward Thomson, who would be absolved from his obligation to deliver the particular bills of lading to the plaintiff, and be entitled to enter them as owner under the general bill of lading. If they were not redeemed, then the plaintiff would enter them as the owner of the bills of lading to order, and which by the agreement were to be delivered to him. There would seem, therefore, to have been a fitness to this state of things in the arrangement now complained of.

4. That a false representation by one person of the credit of another, by which a third person is deceived and injured, is a fraud upon the parties so deceived, is undeniable. A letter of credit, giving to the person in whose favor it is written a character for solidity which the writer knows to be untrue, is of this description. But to uphold the credit of a merchant by advances to any amount made by his friends or by his creditors for the purpose of preventing his failure and of enabling him to go on, 300*] under the expectation that he *may thereby acquire the means of discharging his debts, and of maintaining a standing in the commercial world, has never yet been decided by any English or American court, to be a fraud upon any third person, who, misled by appearances, may have dealt with and given credit to the person so assisted. No case resembling it has been produced or alluded to. There is, in fact, an absence of that kind of suggestio falsi, or suppressio veri, which the law considers as amounting to actual or even constructive fraud.

It is insisted that the conduct of the Nicolls, in this particular, was a contrivance to give a false credit to Edward Thomson at the custom-house for the purpose of enabling him to defraud the United States of their duties on the goods entered in his name. But is this likely? If the custom-house officers were faithful to the duties which the law imposed upon them, and which they had solemnly engaged to perform, how was it possible that the United States could be defrauded, or in any manner prejudiced by such a contrivance? Their duty was to retain the custody of the teas under their own lock and key until the duties were paid, or such security given as should be entirely satisfactory to them. Could it have entered into the minds of any persons that officers so bound and so confided in by their country could so far betray their trust as to open the doors of their warehouses to Edward Thomson to take out teas whenever and to whatever amount he pleased without permits, and without paying or securing the duties upon them, by giving solid and satisfactory sureties to pay them when they should become due? It is the sufficiency of the sureties, and not that of the principal, that the law looks to. I am not to be understood as saying that the conspiracy or contrivance imputed to these parties was not or could not have been in their contemplation. But when we are upon the subject of motives and intention, the improbability of their existence deserves consideration. If, indeed, the illegal abduction of the teas, with the anticipated and known connivance of the custom-house officers, formed a part of the contrivance, a case of fraud would be made out; and it will be for the jury to decide whether the participation of the plaintiff, or of Smith and *Nicoll, [301 in those disgraceful transactions, is made out by the evidence in the cause.

5. I pass over the next objection with this single observation; that the indorsement of the outward bills of lading to the plaintiff for a full consideration (if it should be the opinion of the jury that such was the fact), transferred to him the property mentioned in them; and if the bonds with the memorandum annexed were agreed by the parties to form parts of the securities to be given to the plaintiff, there was no impropriety, much less fraud, in antedating the latter so as to make them conform to the former.

6. The objection that possession of the ships and their cargoes was not delivered at the time they were transferred, was so fully refuted by the Supreme Court in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company that it would be a waste of time for this court to notice it further than by observing that the outward cargoes and their proceeds were mortgaged, not conveyed absolutely, to the plaintiff; that the ships were at or beyond sea at the time they were conveyed; and that possession of them was demanded and refused by the officers of the United States as soon as they arrived. These facts are not disputed, and the legal result is that under these circumstances the want of possession is not a badge of fraud.

7. The last instance of fraud relied upon by the defendant's counsel is that Edward Thomson was induced by the Nicolls, contrary to his own wishes, to trade upon the credit for the duties allowed him by the United States, instead of holding his funds in order to discharge those duties when they should become payable.

To this objection it has been asked, and it seems to the court with great propriety, for what other purpose was the extended credit of two years given but to enable the owner of teas in store or on bond to trade on his capital in the meantime? If it was a fraud in him to employ his capital otherwise than in retaining it to meet the claim of the United States at the expiration of the two years, it is difficult to perceive the advantage which the credit bestowed upon him, or the policy of the law in granting it. And if 302] it was *not a fraud in Edward Thomson so to employ his capital, it could not be so in the Nicolls to influence him to exercise the privilege to which he was legally entitled.

I now pass from the question of fraud to other objections to the plaintiff's right of recovery, which not having occurred in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, will demand particular attention.

3. The third objection to the plaintiff's recovery is founded upon an acknowledged variance, though to a very trifling amount, in the number and description of the boxes or packages of teas between the declaration and the proof.

I do not understand the objection as being urged to the extent of defeating the action altogether; since the counsel who urged it could not but know that a mere variance as to number, magnitude, extent, &c., is immaterial, even in criminal prosecutions, unless the quantum be descriptive of the nature of the charge or claim.¹

The objection is no doubt intended to apply to the damages claimed by the plaintiff in case the jury may legally give any in this case. As to this view of the subject I take the rule in ordinary cases to be that the plaintiff can only recover according to his proof, where that falls short of the number, &c., stated in the declaration; but if it exceed, the plaintiff cannot recover beyond what his declaration demands.

Although the agreements between the plaintiff and the United States and their counsel might, in this case, vary this rule unfavorably to the United States, still, as the difference between the number of chests stated in the declaration and those given in evidence is trifling in amount, I shall direct the jury to adopt the rule in ordinary cases, as already mentioned.

4. The next objection is of a more serious character. It is insisted that the transfers made by Edward Thomson to the plaintiff, under which he claims the proceeds in question, devested him of all, or nearly all, of his property; and that the plaintiff, in respect to the right of preference of the United States, is to be treated as a trustee or general assignee * of the [303 effects of Edward Thomson, within the meaning of the sixty-fifth section of the Duty Act of the 2d March, 1799.

I take the rule as now well settled by the Supreme Court to be, that the preference of the United States does not extend to cases where the debtor has not made an assignment of the whole of his property. If the assignment leave out a trivial part of his property for the purpose of evading the act giving the preference, it will be considered as a fraud upon the law, and the court will treat it as a total divestment.²

But does this rule, or the reason upon which it is founded, apply to a mortgage of the whole of the debtor's property? I ask the question, and shall reason upon it without meaning to decide it; since it was not made or discussed at the bar. On the contrary, and for that reason, I shall instruct the jury to consider these transfers as absolute, so far as they concern the right of preference claimed by the United States.

The difference between a mortgage and an absolute conveyance of the whole of the debtor's estate and effects for the benefit of a particular creditor or set of creditors, is, that in the latter case he divests himself of the whole, not only of his property, but of his credit, and his intention to do so is apparent from the act itself. If he be a merchant, he must stop; and the conclusion is inevitable that the conveyance was made with a view to a legal insolvency.

But a mortgage does not necessarily divest the mortgagee of the whole of the property which it conveys. An equity of redemption still remains in him, which is property, worth to the owner of it all the difference between the value of the pledge and the sum for which it is pledged; which he may sell and convey, or devise; which will descend, and may be levied upon under an execution. Suppose that, from some of those circumstances which are constantly occurring to raise or depress the market for particular articles of commerce, the teas in question had been worth, at the period of importation, greatly more than the amount for which these securities were given; the excess would have belonged, not *to the plaintiff [304 iff, but to Edward Thomson; in which event it would appear that no act of legal insolvency had been committed; and yet it was committed, if at all, at the time the securities or mortgages were given.

Neither does it follow that such a mortgage as has been spoken of destroys the credit of the debtor, compels him (if a merchant) to stop, or that it is given in contemplation of a legal insolvency. The reverse would seem to be the case, since (if the transaction be bona fide) the mortgage can be preferred to an absolute conveyance, for no other purpose but to avoid those consequences. I say, if made bona fide, because I admit that if the mode of conveyance by way of mortgage or pledge be a mere device to defeat the right of preference of the United States (a fact to be decided by all the circumstances of the case), it would be a fraud, and the mortgagee would be treated as a trustee to the extent of the claim of the United States.

I shall pursue this inquiry no farther; since, for the reason before mentioned, I shall instruct the jury to consider the securities, in reference to the question now under consideration, as if they were absolute transfers.

2. United States v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 91.

1. Stark. Evid., 1528, 1538.

Evidence has been given in this case that Edward Thomson continued his commercial transactions as usual until the 16th or 17th of November, 1825; when the Nicolls entered up judgments against him, which entirely prostrated him, so that on the 19th of that month he made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The questions, then, for the jury, under this head will be, 1st. Was Edward Thomson insolvent and unable to pay all his debts at the time when these securities were given to the plaintiff? And 2d. Did they divest him of all his property (or if not, was the part reserved trivial) with intent to defeat the rights of preference of the United States? If these facts are proved to your satisfaction, then the transfers are to be considered as constructively divesting Edward Thomson of all his property, so as to let in the priority of the United States against the plaintiff. The cessation from business by Edward Thomson after the transfers; an intention to make a general assignment, and to commit an act of legal insolvency at the time these securities were 305given, may be considered, if proved, as evidence that they were colorable and fraudulent as to the United States.

But if Edward Thomson, though unable to pay all his debts, did not divest himself of all his property, either actually or constructively; and if the securities were given bona fide to secure debts justly due to the plaintiff in the ordinary course of business, the right of preference of the United States did not attach as a consequence of those securities, so as to defeat the right of the plaintiff to the property in question.

The facts that Edward Thomson continued to transact his mercantile business and to pay his debts as usual, and finally made a general assignment, not voluntarily, but by compulsion, may, if proved to your satisfaction, be considered as evidence that these securities were not colorable, or intended to defeat the right of preference of the United States.

5. The next subject of your inquiry is whether the homeward cargoes, forming parts of the property in dispute, were the proceeds of the outward cargoes which were pledged to the plaintiff. Unless this fact be proved to your satisfaction, the plaintiff shows no title whatever to them. The evidence relied upon by the plaintiff is:

1st. The correspondence in amount and value between the outward and homeward bills of lading and invoices; except in one instance, where it was stated by Rodney Fisher part of the outward cargo was used for the disbursements of the ship.

2d. The delivery of the homeward bills of lading to the plaintiff, immediately on their arrival, by Peter Mackie, the confidential and chief clerk of Edward Thomson before his failure and one of his general assignees, through whose hands and by whose agency, it is insisted, all these negotiations from their commencement were transacted, and who knew, better than any other person, to whom the respective bills of lading belonged.

3d. The evidence of Peter Mackie, which you have heard.

The fact must be decided by the jury upon this and any opposing evidence given on the part of the defendants.

6. It is next objected that the securities in question were *given in consideration [306 of responsibilities entered into by the Nicolls, and not for moneys actually paid by them for, or lent to, Edward Thomson.

In Conard v. The American Insurance Company, it was objected that the debt for which the respondentia and other securities were given was of too contingent a nature to uphold a mortgage as collateral security. In answer, it was said by the judge who delivered the opinion of the court: "We know of no principle or decision to warrant this conclusion. Mortgages may as well be given to secure future advances and contingent debts as those that already exist, and are certain and due. The only question is the bona fides of the transaction."

I understand the objection now made to apply to the discharge by the Nicolls of Edward Thomson's respondentia bonds to the New York insurance offices. There is no proof, it is said, that these were paid by the Nicolls, but merely that they made themselves responsible to those offices that they should be paid.

But if you are satisfied, from the evidence before you, that the Nicolls discharged Edward Thomson from those debts by taking up and delivering over to him the evidence of them, Edward Thomson from that moment became the debtor of the person who had thus discharged him; and it is not important to the plaintiff's recovery in this case to prove how the arrangement was made with those creditors, and that actual payment was made at the time when the securities in question were given. I know of no principle which prevents a person from taking a valid security, by respondentia or otherwise, in consideration of responsibilities entered into by him for debts due by the person giving them, which he afterwards pays off or satisfies, and from which he had discharged such person, as against his original creditor.

7. It is objected, on the part of the defendant, that the securities in question are usurious, inasmuch as they cover interest on the debts due by Edward Thomson to the Nicolls, from a period antecedent to the loans or advances which created the debts. If this should appear to the jury to be the fact, the charge of usury it made out, and the securities *would be void, according to the law [307 of the State of New York. But the law of this State is otherwise; it does not avoid the security, but merely prevents the creditor from recovering more than the legal interest whether more than legal interest was covered by these securities, or any, or either of them; and whether they were executed in this State or in the State of New York, are questions for the decision of the jury.

If the objection is intended to apply to the marine interests merely, it presents a different subject for consideration. Marine interest is allowable, though exceeding the rate of legal interest, as a compensation, not for forbearance, but for the risk which the lender assumes, by which both principal and interest may be lost by the casualties of the voyage. As to that, the question turns solely upon the bona fides of the transaction:—whether the security given be a bona fide marine contract, bottomed upon property of sufficient value on board and at the risk of the lender, or is a mere device to cover an usurious transaction; and whether it was the one or the other in the present case, are questions for the jury to decide.

8. The last objection to the plaintiff's right to recover is that the conveyances and securities given by Edward Thomson to the plaintiff amounted to acts of legal bankruptcy; in consequence of which the preference of the United States attached, and the plaintiff is to be considered as a trustee to the extent of the claims of the United States. The argument is that these conveyances and securities, considering them as one transaction, would, according to the bankrupt laws of England, amount to an act of bankruptcy; and that the sixty-fifth section of the Duty Act of the 2d of March, 1799, was intended to give to the United States a right of preference from the time when, according to that law, an act of bankruptcy was committed.

This is by no means the opinion of the court. The section refers to State bankrupt laws, and perhaps to a bankrupt law of the United States, when one should pass; but could have no reference whatever to the bankrupt laws of England. Nor does it, in my opinion, refer the 308] right of *preference of the United States to an act of bankruptcy unaccompanied by some other act.

To understand the meaning of this section we must construe the enacting clause and the proviso together. The former declares no more than that in all cases of insolvency, or where an estate in the hands of an executor, administrator or assignees, should be insufficient to pay all the debts of the deceased, the debts due to the United States should be first satisfied by those persons. It provides for only two cases, viz., a living insolvent, having an assignee, and a dead insolvent, represented by executors or administrators.

But the inquiry would naturally have arisen in the mind of the Legislature, how is the expression insolvency to be understood? This is explained by the proviso; for which purpose alone, it is apparent, it was introduced. It declares that the expression shall extend to the following case, viz.:

1st. Where a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof for the benefit of his creditors.

2d. Where his estate and effects have been attached on account of his being an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor.

3d. To cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall have been committed; that is, as the construction of the proviso in connection with the enacting clause seems necessarily to require, to cases where the property is in the hands of assignees, not by voluntary assignment only, but by assignment made in virtue of any State bankrupt law, or (possibly) of any bankrupt law of the United States which might thereafter be passed.

There must be an assignment, either voluntary or compulsory, or else there can be no assignee to be made liable to the United States under the enacting clause. If a mere act of bankruptcy be sufficient to give rise to the preference of the United States from the moment of its commission, where is the assignee who is first to satisfy the claims of the United States out of the estate of the debtor, under the penalty, stated in the enacting clause, of satisfying it out of his own estate.

*If it be said that when the assign- [309] ment of the bankrupt's estate shall be made, the preference of the United States will relate back to the Act of Bankruptcy so as to overreach intermediate bona fide securities given by the insolvent to creditors, I can only answer that the assumption is altogether gratuitous, and receives no countenance from any part of this or any other act on this subject.

The last question to be decided is, whether the jury are prevented by the agreement between the plaintiff and the United States or their counsel, or by the delivery of the property levied upon by the defendant to the plaintiff under the agreement, from giving damages in this case. I am clearly of opinion that they are not. As to the surrender of the property to the plaintiff, that could not, in an ordinary case, if put into the form of a plea, bar the right of the plaintiff to damages for an illegal taking, unless it were surrendered by the defendant, and received by the plaintiff in satisfaction of damages. But so far from the accord in this case having been in satisfaction of damages, the bond expressly stipulates that it is to be "without prejudice to any existing right."

The jury may, therefore, give such reasonable damages as the plaintiff has actually sustained by the seizure and detention of the property in dispute, in case they should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to that property or to its proceeds. They ought not to give vindictive or speculative damages.

Upon the whole, if the plaintiff has established his right of property in the ships and cargoes claimed by him under the assignments and conveyances that have been given in evidence to establish that right, he is entitled to their proceeds and to your verdict in his favor, together with such damages as you may think him entitled to. If, on the other hand, he has failed to establish such right, or if in your opinion his title is invalidated by the objections, or some one or more of them, made to it, then the United States are entitled to the proceeds; and in that case you ought to find for the defendant."

The case was submitted to this court without argument *by Mr. Berrien, Attor- [310] ney-General, for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Webster for the defendant.

Mr. Justice BALDWIN delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause has been submitted without argument. It is in all its leading features, both in the points of law which arose and the evidence given at the trial, so similar to the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, decided by this court at January Term, 1828 (1 Peters, 386), that we do not think it necessary to enter into an examination of the principles on which the judge submitted the cause to the jury. They appear to us to be in perfect accordance with the opinion delivered in that case, on great deliberation; of the entire correctness of which we do not entertain a doubt.

There is no error in the record of the Circuit Court, and the judgment is affirmed, with six per cent. interest and costs.

JAMES HAMILTON, JAMES STRICKER
AND FRANCES HIS WIFE, HEZEKIAH FULKSE, ABRAHAM HANCY, AND JOHN HOPKINS, Appellees.

Equity—specific performance—surplus of land over that called for by patent.

The complainants, in the Circuit Court of Ohio, filed a bill to enforce the specific performance of a contract. The bill states that there is a surplus of several hundred acres, and by actual measurement it is found to be eight hundred and seventy-six acres—the patent having been granted for one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres—beyond the quantity mentioned in the contract.

It is a fact of general notoriety that the surveys and patents for lands within the Virginia military district contain a greater quantity of land than is specified in the grants. Parties, when entering into a contract for the purchase of a tract of land in that district, and referring to the patent for a description, of course expect that the quantity would exceed the specified number of acres. But so large an excess as in the present case can hardly be presumed to have been within the expectation of either party. And admitting that a strict legal interpretation of a contract would entitle the purchaser to the surplus, whatever it might be, it by no means follows that a court of chancery will in all cases lend its aid to enforce a specific performance of such a contract. [321]

The powers of a court of chancery to enforce a specific execution of contracts are very valuable and important. For in many cases where the remedy at law for damages is not lost, complete justice cannot be done without a specific execution. And it has been almost as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree a specific execution of a contract for the purchase of lands, where in its nature and circumstances it is unobjectionable, as it is to give damages at law where an action will lie for a breach of the contract. But this power is to be exercised under the sound discretion of the court, with an eye to the substantial justice of the case. [328]

When a party comes into a court of chancery seeking equity, he is bound to do justice, and not ask the court to become the instrument of iniquity. When a contract is hard and destitute of all equity, the court will leave parties to their remedy at law; and if that has been lost by negligence, they must abide by it. [328]

It is a settled rule in a bill for specific performance of a contract to allow a defendant to show that it is unreasonable, or unconscientious, or founded in mistake or other circumstances leading satisfactorily to the conclusion that the granting of the prayer of the bill would be inequitable and unjust. Gross negligence on the part of the complainant has great weight in cases of this kind. A party, to entitle himself to the aid of a court of chancery for a specific execution of a contract, should show himself ready and desirous to perform his part. [328]

If this large surplus of eight hundred and seventy-six acres in a patent for one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres should be taken as included in the original purchase, it might well be considered a case of gross inadequacy of price. [329]

*When there was so great a surplus of land [*312 in the patent beyond that which it called for, nominally, as that it could hardly be presumed to have been within the view of either of the parties to the contract of sale, the court decreed a conveyance of the surplus, the vendee to pay for the same at the average rate per acre, with interest, which the consideration money mentioned in the contract bore to the quantity of land named in the same. [330]

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of Ohio.

In the Circuit Court for the District of Ohio, James Hamilton, James Stricker and Frances his wife, late Frances Hamilton, heirs-at-law of Alexander Hamilton and others grantees of Alexander Hamilton, filed a bill for a specific performance of a contract entered into between Elisha King, the father of John W. King, one of the appellants, and Alexander Hamilton, on the 8th of February, 1815, for the sale of certain lands in the State of Ohio within the Virginia military district, between the Little Miami and the Scioto River.

The contract was in the following terms:

"I this day sell to Alexander Hamilton all my lands lying on the Miami River, in the State of Ohio, one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and a third acres, as by patent in my name; also, three hundred and thirty-three and one-third, taken off the lands patented in the name of Sackville King, of one thousand acres. This land of three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, taken from S. King's, is to be done adjoining to the entry of E. King's of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third. He, the said Hamilton, is bound to pay to Elisha King for this land nine hundred and forty-six pounds sixteen shillings of current money of Virginia, in three annual payments, beginning December 25, 1805; then to pay three hundred and fifteen pounds twelve shillings. Also, in the years of 1806 and 1807, on each Christ's day, or before, to make the full payments, as is above. The manner and agreement made by us is in payment as tenders: the said Hamilton takes to this country horses, to be sold at twelve months' credit, taking bond and good security, which bonds is lawful tenders from year to year; and, on these tenders being made, the said King is bound to give to the said Hamilton good titles to the said lands. We do bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, administrators, firmly, by these presents, in the *penalty of two thousand pounds, in [*313 this our bargain. Given under our hands and seals."

When this contract was made, Elisha King had a patent for his entry, No. 1548. Sackville King's entry, No. 1549, was held by him without any title to it; and afterwards, in 1812, Sackville King's whole entry was conveyed by him to another, who now holds the same. Alexander Hamilton entered on No. 1548 immediately after his purchase, supposed to be one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres; and, with others holding under him, made valuable improvements on it, and still holds possession of the same.

NOTE.—As to specific performance of contracts, see note to Pratt v. Carroll, 8 Cranch, 471; note to Hepburn v. Dunlop, 1 Wheat., 179; note to Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat., 290; note to Colson v. Thompson, 2 Wheat., 336; and note to Brashier v. Gratz, 6 Wheat., 528.

The bill states that Hamilton continued to make payments until the 22d June, 1809, at which time, he having paid one-half of the purchase money of the tract estimated at one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, King made a conveyance to him of seven hundred and sixty-six and two-third acres, supposed to be a conveyance of one-half of the same. The bill charges that there was a large surplus of several hundred acres, and that this sale was in gross; and insists on a conveyance of the whole of the lands in No. 1548. The patent to Elisha King for No. 1548 bears date the 10th of March, 1804, and is for "a certain tract of land containing one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres," as by survey bearing date the 13th of April, 1792; and sets forth the metes and bounds according to this survey.

The bill claims an allowance for the loss of three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of Sackville King's entry, and proceeds to state and charge sundry payments since the conveyance of the 22d of June, 1809, the last of which was made on the 26th of March, 1818. It then admits that there was due at the time of filing the bill, on the tract of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres (deducting the consideration money expressed in the conveyance for seven hundred and sixty-six and two-third acres, the ratable value of the other tract of three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres which was lost, and all the subsequent payments) the sum of 314] one thousand seven hundred dollars yet to be paid by Hamilton to King on the contract for the one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acre tract; which sum they say they were always ready to pay since the death of Alexander Hamilton, if they could have procured a fair settlement; and also, that they are informed and believe that Alexander Hamilton, when he could have a settlement and receive a title, was always ready in his lifetime to make payments. The bill then goes on to state a number of improvements made on that part of the land not conveyed by King to Hamilton; which improvements are stated to have been made by Hamilton and the other appellees claiming by purchase under him.

The bill then prays an injunction to a judgment in ejectment recovered at June Term, 1824, for that part of the tract of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres not conveyed. It asks a decree for a conveyance, on payment of the balance, and for general relief.

The answer denies that the sale was in gross, and also that the complainants were at any time ready to perform the agreement, by the payment of the purchase money for the tract which was agreed to be sold; and alleges that the payment of the same was evaded and delayed, although frequent promises of performance were made. To this answer there was a general replication.

At January Term, 1826, an agreement was entered into by the parties (which being entered of record, takes the place of an interlocutory decree) in order to settle so much of the controversy; that there was then due to King, on the purchase money and interest, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars eighty-eight cents, after deducting five hundred and sixty-six dollars sixty-six cents on account of the land sold, included in Sackville King's patent, which, with interest from that time, was all that was to be paid King, if the court decreed that the contract covered the surplus above one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, in the entry 1548. The times for paying that sum were agreed; and, also, that on the payment, deeds should be executed by respondents, covering the whole land, if the *contract was decreed to be [315 in gross, and the injunction be made perpetual against the proceedings in ejectment, &c. This agreement reserved for future decision the single question whether the contract of sale was a sale in gross or by the acre, as to the land in the entry 1548; and concludes as follows: "to avoid all dispute, it is the express understanding of the parties that the whole question concerning the said surplus land is reserved for future decision; and all claims for damages respecting failure in the title for the tract of three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of land, in the bill mentioned, are waived."

At July Term, 1826, the court decreed that the sale by Elisha King to Alexander Hamilton was a sale of the whole of the land in No. 1548; and that the defendant, John W. King, should, within two months, convey to the complainants in fee-simple, with covenants of special warranty, the lands not already conveyed by E. King to Alexander Hamilton; that the complainants, within two months, should pay the balance agreed with interest; and that each party should pay their own costs at or before the next term. As to the other defendants, the bill was dismissed generally.

From this decree John W. King appealed to this court.

For the appellants it was contended, by Mr. Doddridge:

1. That, under the agreement entered into by the parties to the suit at January Term, 1826, John W. King reserved to himself the right to urge, as to the surplus land, whatever could have been urged as to the relief claimed for the land not surveyed, as well as every other separate defense which he had a right to make as to the surplus, independent of the agreement.

2. That no evidence was given in the case to establish the fact that the payments made by Hamilton were for the land not conveyed, and that the payments made were to be applied to the land which had been conveyed. So that, for the land not conveyed, nothing had been paid for a period of nineteen years.

3. No possession of the land not conveyed was delivered by King to Hamilton.

*4. That the sale was not a sale in [316 gross; and the sale in gross having been denied in the answer and no evidence given, the court erred in finding for the appellees.

5. That the appellant ought not to be required in a court of equity to yield the title to so large a surplus without compensation, and without the clearest proof of the agreement.

The law of Virginia regulating lands under military grants declares that as to the surplus lands in a grant, anyone may give the war-rantee notice to survey the quantity included in the grant; and if he neglects or refuses to do so, he may, after twelve months, apply to the County Court, and have a survey made for himself; and he may then enter the surplus land, and thus become the legal owner of it. This gives the original grantee a right of pre-emption to all the surplus beyond five per cent., which is allowed in every grant. This must be done during the life of the original grantee, and during the continuance of his title; after a sale, and after a descent cast, the right to the surplus is abandoned by the state to the grantee.

In Ohio there is no court to which an application for a re-survey can be addressed, and, therefore, the right to the surplus lands in the Virginia reservation of military lands in that State is complete in the grantee, unless it was so great as to amount to a fraud.

The right, therefore, of King to the whole land included in the grant, it being within the Virginia reservation, is complete. At law, it is necessarily so; and this is recognized in Taylor v. Brown (5 Cranch, 234, 241); and it is so in equity. (Dunlap v. Dunlap, 12 Wheat., 574).

The surplus lands are, therefore, to be considered as having passed to Elisha King as fully as if the whole actual quantity had been stated in the grant.

It is next assumed as a position that whenever there is an excess or deficiency of quantity of lands sold, and both parties are ignorant of the fact at the time of the sale, equity will relieve the party aggrieved by adding to or reducing the purchase money pro rata; and 317 the relief given proceeds *on the ground of mistake. In support of this principle there have been decisions in the courts of Virginia. (1 Call, 301; 2 Hen. & Munf., 244; Hall v. Cunningham, 2 Hen. & Munf., 336). In a note to this case, authorities are referred to for the purpose of showing what relief ought to be granted under such circumstances. (2 Hen. & Munf., 161, 179, 175, 177; 1 Hen. & Munf. 201.)

These authorities establish: 1. That if the excess be considerable, and the same of a deficiency, and each party is innocent, there should be a dissolution of the whole contract. 2. If the excess or deficiency be small, and there has been no evictions, there should be an addition to or deduction from the gross sum, after the rate of the whole contract. 3. If deeds have been made and possession given, and there has been an eviction of part, compensation should be decreed according to the value at the time of the eviction. (Cited, also, 8 Cranch, 371, and note to the same case, p. 375.)

These cases show that there is a general rule to give relief where the excess exceeds five per cent.; and that this relief will be denied when the contract was for a gross sum, or where the vendor had perfect knowledge of the land and the vendee had not, but the vendee took upon himself the risk as to lines and quantity. That courts lean against the establishment of such contracts, having a gaming or immoral tendency. That whatever may be the terms of the written contract, the fact of a sale by the acre or in gross, lies in averment; and, consequently, where either of these facts is charged in the bill as a ground for relief, and the ground is denied in the answer, the answer will prevail without proof of the fact and the bill will be dismissed, the answer being responsive to a material charge in the bill. That the words "more or less," and proof that the whole tract was sold, are not of themselves sufficient to prevent relief; and there is no adjudged case proceeding on that ground alone. An examination, with reference to these authorities, of the contract between Elisha King and Hamilton, will abundantly show that had the whole property sold been *conveyed [318 and paid for by Hamilton, a discovery of the surplus afterwards would have entitled the vendor to relief. The situation of the country settled, and the property held by each grantee well known; the relations of the parties to it (Hamilton living on adjoining lands, and King residing at the distance of six hundred miles, and ignorant of the practice of including a much larger quantity of land in the survey than the grant called for), are circumstances which should materially operate when the transactions and the claims arising out of it are considered.

It is confidently asserted that the facts of this case will not authorize a court to decree a specific performance of the contract, independent of the principles and the rules of law which have been urged. While it is admitted that for a forfeiture occasioned by a breach of his contract the vendor may be the subject of relief in a court of equity in favor of a vendee, it is relied upon that the vendee must account for his nonperformance by circumstances which will exculpate himself. In this case, the failure of Hamilton to pay for the land according to the contract is fully proved by the whole case. (Cited, Pickett v. Dondall, 2 Marsh., 115.)

The counsel for the appellants also contended that the operation and just construction of the transactions between the parties were, that the payments made were to be applied to the portion of the land which had been conveyed; and that this was considered a performance of the contract so far as the purchaser was entitled to the same.

He also contended that the object of the complainant was not only to be relieved from a forfeiture, but also to ask the specific execution of a contract, certainly made under a mistake, and by which hard and unconscionable terms will be imposed on the appellant. Courts of equity are not bound to decree a specific performance in all cases; they do so only at their discretion, and they will withhold such a decree where the terms would be hard, although no fraud should be proved. (1 Wash. Rep., 270.)

Mr. J. C. Wright*, for the appellees. [319

In 1805 the whole tract was sold by Elisha King to Hamilton, referring to the patent by number and quantity. Hamilton took possession of the land under the contract, and improved it, and in 1809 a deed was made for one-half of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres. Before the deed was made there had been no survey; but an estimate of the quantity was made by the parties. In 1818 Elisha King conveyed the remaining half to John W. King, according to a survey then made, and thus he took the legal estate subject to the agreement with Hamilton, to which he had been a witness. He stands thus in the relations of his father, and the estate held by him is subject to the equities of the appellees, as he had full notice of this contract. He does not stand as an innocent purchaser and entitled to favor; but if his purchase was made to the injury of the rights of Hamilton, he is to be considered as an intruder. When he received the conveyance more than half the purchase money had been paid, or was paid before this suit. Those who purchased from Hamilton have improved the part so acquired, and these improvements are out of the seven hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds acres conveyed by King.

All the questions in the case, except that of the right to the surplus land, have been settled by the agreement of 1826. The appellees upon that question contend that the sale was in gross.

The court will go behind the deed executed by Elisha King for part of the land, to ascertain what was the intention of the parties. (1 Call's Rep., 301.)

It is denied that the rule laid down by the counsel for the appellant, as to surplus, exists. The principles which have been established are, that when a sale is made by metes and bounds, by general terms, where the whole thing is sold, as in this case, the land is described, as held under a patent, and for a sum specified in amount, and not pro rata as to quantity, it is a sale in gross, and the purchaser takes all the land within the boundaries. (Cited, 12 Wheat., 574; Powell v. Clarke, 5 Mass., 355; 1 Caines, 493; 2 Johns. Rep., 37; Vowles et al. v. Craig et al., 8 Cranch, 374; also 320*) Sugden on Vendors, 200; 2 Bibb's Rep., 451; 1 Madd. Chan., 74, 76, 77; 1 Call's Rep., 301.)

What is the contract? "I this day sell to Alexander Hamilton all my lands lying on the Miami River, in the State of Ohio, one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and a third acres, as by patent in my name."

The case admits that the patent referred to was the one obtained on survey No. 1548; and the survey sets forth the metes and bounds of the tract within which is now the whole claim of the appellees. The contract is, therefore, one for the whole land, not by quantity, but by patent; and "all" the lands of the vendor are sold.

Mr. Justice THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up on appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Seventh Circuit, in the District of Ohio.

The bill in the court below was filed for the purpose of obtaining the specific execution of a contract entered into between Elisha King, the father of John W. King, and Alexander Hamilton, the father of James Hamilton; and also to enjoin all further proceedings at law on a judgment in an action of ejectment obtained by John W. King, for the recovery of possession of a part of the land alleged to have been comprised within the contract.

The answer to this bill is very inartificially drawn, but no exceptions were taken to it, and the general replication put in. No proofs were taken upon the principal matters in dispute; but the cause came on to a hearing upon the bill and answer and exhibits, and the agreement which had been entered into between the counsel for the parties in the progress of the cause. This agreement puts at rest many of the questions that might otherwise have arisen, and reduces the subject of dispute to the single inquiry respecting what is called by the parties the surplus land; and this involves the inquiries: first, whether this surplus is embraced in the original contract; and if so, then, second, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the complainants in the court below have not lost their right to call upon a court of equity to enforce a specific performance of that contract.

*The contract signed by Elisha King [321 and Alexander Hamilton bears date on the 8th of February, 1805, and is as follows: "I this day sell to Alexander Hamilton all my lands lying on the Miami River, in the State of Ohio, one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, as by patent in my name; also three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, taken off the lands patented in the name of Saekville King, adjoining to that entry of Elisha King, of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres. He, the said Hamilton, is bound to pay to Elisha King for this land nine hundred and forty-six pounds sixteen shillings, current money of Virginia, in three payments, beginning December 25th, 1805; then to pay one hundred and fifteen pounds twelve shillings, also, in the year 1806 and 1807, each Christmas day, or before, to make the full payments, as is above. The manner and agreement made by us is in payment as tenders: the said Hamilton takes to this country, horses, to be sold at twelve months' credit, taking bond and good security, which bond is lawful tenders from year to year; and on these tenders being made, the said King is bound to give to said Hamilton good title to said lands," &c.

The bill states that there is a surplus of several hundred acres beyond the specific quantity mentioned in the contract. The answer alleges that from actual survey, the patent is found to contain two thousand four hundred and nine and a half acres, which will leave a surplus of eight hundred and seventy-six acres; a quantity equal to more than one-half of the whole number of acres mentioned in the contract.

It may perhaps be assumed as facts of general notoriety, that the surveys and patents for lands lying within the Virginia military district, contain a greater quantity of land than is specified in the grant; and that parties would, of course, when entering into a contract for the purchase of a tract of land, and referring to the patent for a description, expect that the quantity would exceed the specified number of acres. But so large an excess as in the present case can hardly be presumed to have been within the expectation of either party; and admitting that a strict legal interpretation *of a [322 contract would entitle the purchaser to the surplus, whatever it might be, it by no means follows that a court of chancery will in all cases lend its aid to enforce a specific performance of such a contract.

The agreement entered into by the counsel which has been hitherto, and which will be more particularly noticed hereafter, puts an end to all questions respecting the land, to the extent of one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres. Otherwise it might well be questioned whether the complainants in the court below could compel a conveyance for any more than has already been conveyed under the contract.

In 1809 a conveyance was given for seven hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds acres, the full consideration for which, after deducting five hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents for defect of title in Elisha King to the three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of land included in Sackville King's patent, had not been paid when the bill was filed.

If the rights of these parties were to be governed and determined solely by the question whether the contract covers the surplus land, we should have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it does. There is nothing upon the face of the contract from which it can be satisfactorily inferred that it was intended to be a sale by the acre. The language of the contract on the part of King is, "I this day sell to Alexander Hamilton all my lands lying on the Miami River, in the State of Ohio, one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, as by patent in my name." Had it been intended a sale by the acre, the language would doubtless have been, one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of, or a part of my lands, &c.: instead of which it is "all my lands, as by patents in my name." Reference is made to the patent for a description of the land, and to ascertain the subject matter of the contract. And whatever would pass under the patent to King would be included in the sale to Hamilton. The number of acres is mentioned in reference to what appears by the patent (one thousand five hundred and 323 thirty-three and *one-third acres, as by patent in my name), and not as designating the precise quantity sold. But admitting the contract covers the surplus land, it is contended on the part of the appellants that a court of equity will not, under the circumstances of this case, enforce a specific performance of the contract. It is insisted, however, on the part of the appellees, that all equitable considerations are precluded by the agreement entered into by the counsel, which has been referred to; and that the question is narrowed down to the single inquiry whether the surplus land is included in the original contract of 1805. If such is the construction to be given to this agreement, the question has already been answered. It becomes, therefore, very material, to examine whether this is the fair and reasonable interpretation of the agreement. It is as follows:

1. "It is agreed that the complainants are at this time (January 6, 1826) indebted to the said John W. King, one of the defendants above named, for the balance of the purchase money, including up to the date aforesaid the interest, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and eighty-eight cents, for the one thousand five hundred and fifty-three and one-third acres mentioned in the said bill of complaint. This amount, it is agreed between the parties by their counsel, is now due to the said John W. King, after deducting from the gross sum agreed to be paid by the ancestor of the plaintiffs to the ancestor of the defendants, which will appear by contract, five hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents, for the three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres patented to Sackville King, mentioned in the contract, to which the defendants, or their ancestor, never had title. The sum of one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and eighty-eight cents is the whole amount due the said John W. King for the one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of land, the number of entry 1548, as mentioned in said bill; and it is hereby expressly understood between the parties, by their counsel, that the sum last mentioned, if it should be decreed by the court hereafter, or by the parties agreed to, that the surplus lands lying within entry 1548 is covered by the contract before referred to for *the gross sum named, [324 the said sum, with interest from this time until it is paid, is the whole amount due the defendant, John W. King, upon said land contract; but it is hereby agreed between the parties, by counsel, that the question whether the said contract covers the surplus in said entry No. 1548, shall be reserved for future decision and determination; and whether the purchase for the sum mentioned in said contract does not entitle the complainants to the surplus land said to be contained in said No. 1548; and it is hereby agreed by the parties that the complainants shall now pay to the clerk for the said defendants or counsel, seven hundred and thirty dollars, part and parcel of the said sum of one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and eighty-eight cents, before admitted to be due; and that the said complainant shall pay the balance by the next term of this court, or within a reasonable time afterwards. And it is further agreed by the parties, by their counsel, that the said John W. King and the other defendants do join, if it appear necessary, shall execute to the complainants a good deed with covenants of general warranty for the land which the complainants shall be entitled to under the contract aforesaid immediately upon the payment of the purchase money. It is further agreed by the parties, by their counsel, that the complainants shall pay the cost in the action of ejectment brought in this court for the lands named in the bill, and the costs of this suit, to abide the decision of this court thereon. And it is further agreed by the parties, by their counsel, that upon the payment of the whole of the purchase money which may be due the defendants for said land, then, and in that case, the injunction is to be made perpetual. And, to avoid all dispute, it is the express understanding of the parties that the whole question concerning the said surplus land is reserved for future decision; and that all claims for damages, respecting the failure in the title for the tract of three hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres of land, are waived."

This agreement is somewhat obscurely worded, and its construction not without difficulty. Doubts have been entertained by the court whether the appellants have not thereby precluded themselves from resisting a specific performance *of the contract on the equi- [325 table grounds that might otherwise be set up.

We have, however, come to the conclusion that the appellants, as to the surplus land, have reserved to themselves the right to set up whatever could have been urged against the relief sought, as to all the land not conveyed as if the agreement had not been entered into. And that as to the surplus land, the case is open, and to be considered entirely independent of the agreement.

Some of the leading objects of the agreement appear to have been to settle and fix the amount of payments that had been made, and the deduction to be allowed on account of the failure of title to the land patented to Sackville King; and to ascertain the balance due, which was found to be one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six dollars and eighty-eight cents, and which by the terms of the agreement is declared to be the whole amount due for the one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres; thereby implying that the consideration agreed to be paid was for that quantity of land, and that as to that quantity no further dispute existed; but at the same time providing, that if the court should decree that the surplus land was covered by the contract, that balance should be deemed the full consideration for the whole. And then adds, "but it is hereby agreed that the question whether the said contract covers the surplus land shall be reserved for future decision and determination." If this had been the only question intended to be reserved, the agreement would have stopped here; there is no ambiguity thus far, or any necessity for putting the same question in a different shape. But the argument goes on, "and whether the purchase for the sum mentioned in the contract does not entitle the complainants to the surplus land said to be contained in No. 1548."

There would appear to be two distinct questions reserved for future determination: 1. Whether the contract covers the surplus land; and if so, 2. Whether the complainants are now entitled to it, by virtue of their original purchase. If this view of the agreement be correct, the second question reserved must have been intended to leave open all objections to the claims for the surplus lands. If, however, [326*] ever, the agreement had stopped here, there might have been serious doubts whether the question reserved was not whether the contract covered the surplus land. But the concluding clause in the agreement seems to have been added to remove all doubts upon the question. "And to avoid all dispute, it is the express understanding of the parties that the whole question concerning the said surplus land is reserved for future decision." If the only question reserved was whether the contract covered the surplus land, there was no necessity or fitness in this last provision. That question had been explicitly and in terms reserved; and to superadd to it that the whole question concerning the surplus was reserved, will admit of no other reasonable construction than that as it respected such surplus, the case was to stand as if the agreement had not been made.

This being the construction given by the court to this agreement of the counsel, it remains to inquire whether the complainants in the court below made out a case, which, according to the rules which prevail in courts of equity, entitled them to a specific execution of the contract as to the surplus land.

This part of the case has not been much pressed upon the court, and it is difficult to perceive on what grounds it can be sustained. To have enforced a specific execution of this contract would, at any time, and under any circumstances, have been granting a strict legal right against the substantial justice and equity of the case.

To show this, it is only necessary to state some of the leading facts in this case. The contract bears date in the year 1805, and by it all the payments for the land were to be completed in December, 1807, on which the title was to have been given. Payment only of a part of the purchase money, and not even to one-half the amount, had been made when the bill was filed. No remedy at law, therefore, ever did exist. The purchaser never was in a situation when he could aver performance of the contract on his part. It is very evident that no consideration whatever has been given for this surplus land. The price was doubtless estimated by the parties upon the specific number of acres (although the sale was [*327 not by the acre], and which at that time was probably supposed to be nearly the quantity of land covered by the patent to King. This, however, turns out to be otherwise. The surplus is very large, amounting to more than one-half the number of acres mentioned in the contract. There are no grounds for charging either party with any knowledge of this fact. King manifestly could not have known it, or it would not have been entirely overlooked in the sale. And Hamilton ought not to be charged with a knowledge of it without satisfactory evidence, as it would be imputing to him a gross fraud. It is, therefore, a case of mutual mistake or ignorance of an important fact, in relation to the subject matter of the contract; and that contract still executory, and now sought to be enforced as to lands for which no consideration has been paid. It is, therefore, a case in which the parties ought to be left to their strict legal rights.

The bill alleges that Hamilton, in his lifetime, made valuable improvements on that part of the land not included in his deed of 1809. When these improvements were made does not appear. The contract is silent as to the time when the purchaser was entitled in the possession, and the bill does not allege that possession was taken, or the improvements made, with the assent of King; and the answer expressly denies that King put Hamilton in possession of any part of the land except that for which the deed was given in 1809, and alleges that the possession of any other part was without authority and unlawful.

In 1818, John W. King, one of the appellants, became the purchaser of all the lands not included in the deed of 1809. He was, it is true, a purchaser with notice of the contract between his father and Hamilton, but he also had notice of all the circumstances with respect to his failure in making payment; and that he had not at that time made payment even for the land which had been conveyed to him, and no further payments had been made when this bill was filed, or any disposition shown on the part of the appellees to perform the contract on their part, and the bill in this case was not filed until 328] nearly seven years from that time, *and not until a judgment in ejectment had been obtained to recover possession of the land not covered by the deed of 1809.

All the payments made upon this purchase might well be applied to the land which has already been conveyed; and was it not for the agreement entered into by the counsel, the complainants in the court below would have had no equitable ground for asking a specific execution of the contract for any portion of the one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres not included in the deed of 1809. But that agreement has put an end to all questions in relation to the residue of the one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres; leaving the case open, as we understand it, to all objections to a specific execution of the contract as to the surplus land, to the same extent as if the agreement had not been entered into.

Did this case, then, thus made out in the court below, entitle the complainants to a specific execution of the contract as to the surplus land? We think it did not, according to the well-settled rules of courts of equity on this subject. This branch of the powers of a court of chancery is very valuable and important. For in many cases, even where the remedy at law for damages is not lost, complete justice cannot be done without a specific execution; and it has become almost as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree a specific execution of a contract for the purchase of lands, where in its nature and circumstances it is unobjectionable, as it is to give damages at law where an action will lie for a breach of the contract. But this power is to be exercised under the sound judicial discretion of the court with an eye to the substantial justice of the case. When a party comes into a court of chancery seeking equity, he is bound to do justice, and not ask the court to become the instrument of iniquity. Where a contract is hard and destitute of all equity, the court will leave parties to their remedy at law; and if that has been lost by negligence, they must abide by it. It is a settled rule, therefore, to allow a defendant in a bill for as specific performance of a contract to show that it is unreasonable or uncon- 329] scientious, or founded *in mistake, or other circumstances leading satisfactorily to the conclusion that granting the prayer of the bill would be inequitable and unjust. Gross negligence on the part of the complainant has great weight in cases of this kind. A party, to entitle himself to the aid of a court of chancery for the specific execution of a contract, should show himself ready and desirous to perform on his part. These are familiar and well-settled rules in courts of chancery, and have a strong bearing upon this case. If this contract had been carried into execution by giving a conveyance for the land, a court of chancery would not have given relief to the other party. But the contract is still executory; and the complainants, after the lapse of twenty years, seek for the specific execution of a contract which has not been performed on their part, and the execution of which would be manifestly unjust and inequitable.

If this large surplus of eight hundred and Peters 4.

seventy-six acres should be taken as included in the original purchase, it might well be considered a case of gross inadequacy of price.

So far, therefore, as the immediate rights of the complainants are involved, no equitable claim has been sustained for a specific execution of the contract for the surplus land. It is, however, alleged in the bill that sales have taken place, and valuable improvements made upon parts of the land not covered by the deed of 1809. This is not denied in the answer, although it is alleged that such improvements were made without the assent of King. No proofs have been taken with respect of these improvements. Their value and extent are left altogether uncertain. But the rights of third persons, who may be bona fide purchasers under Hamilton's supposed title, may be materially affected by dismissing the bill as to the surplus land. Some diversity of opinion has existed amongst us as to the final decree, on account of those improvements. We have, however, come to the conclusion that the complainants in the court below shall have a decree for the surplus land, at the average rate or price which the consideration mentioned in the contract bears to one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six and two-thirds acres, *the number of [330 acres specified in the purchase; together with the interest thereon, from the 25th of December, 1807, being the time at which all the payments were to have been completed, according to the contract. The decree of the Circuit Court must be so modified. It should have required payment of the consideration money before the conveyance was to be given. Such are the terms of the original contract, and also of the agreement of the 6th of January, 1826.

The decree of the Circuit Court as to John W. King must accordingly be reversed, and affirmed as to the other defendants in the court below, and the cause sent back with instructions to cause a survey to be made to ascertain the number of acres contained in the patent; and that, on payment of the balance and interest due according to the settlement made on the 6th of January, 1826, and also a further sum for the surplus land above one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, according as the quantity shall be found on actual survey, at the same average rate or price as in the original contract, with the interest therefor from the 25th day of December, 1807; then the said John W. King to be required to make and execute a good and sufficient deed of conveyance in fee simple to the complainants in the court below for all the lands contained in the patent to Elisha King mentioned in the pleadings, and which have not been already conveyed by the deed of Elisha King, bearing date the 22d of June, 1809. The money to be paid and the deed executed, at such time as the Circuit Court shall direct. The injunction to be continued for such time, and under such modification as shall be judged necessary by the Circuit Court for the purpose of carrying this decree into effect.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Ohio, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is decreed and adjudged by this court, that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed as to John W. 331*] King, and that *the said judgment in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed as to the other defendants in the court below. And it is further ordered and adjudged by this court, that this cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said Circuit Court, with instructions to cause a survey to be made to ascertain the number of acres contained in the patent; and that on payment of the balance and interest due according to the settlement made on the sixth of January, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-six, and also a further sum for the surplus land above fifteen hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres, according as the quantity shall be found on actual survey, at the same average rate or price as in the original contract, with the interest therefor for the twenty-fifth of December eighteen hundred and seven; then the said John W. King to be required to make and execute a good and sufficient deed of conveyance, in fee simple, to the complainants in the court below for all the lands contained in the patent to Elisha King, mentioned in the pleadings, and which have not been already conveyed by the deed of Elisha King, bearing date the twenty-second of June, eighteen hundred and nine. The money to be paid and the deed executed at such time as the said Circuit Court shall direct. The injunction to be continued for such time, and under such modification, as shall be judged necessary by the Circuit Court for the purpose of carrying this decree into effect.

332*] *WILLIAM T. GALT ET AL.,
Appellants.

v.

JAMES GALLOWAY, JUN., ET AL., Ap-
pellees.

Land warrant—in whose name entry made—boundaries—withdrawal of warrant—records of land-office as evidence—Virginia laws regulating military titles—principal and agent—entry in name of deceased person.

The possession of a warrant has always been considered at the land-office in Ohio sufficient authority to make locations under it. Letters of attorney were seldom, if ever, given to locators because they were deemed unnecessary. [339]

An entry could only be made in the name of the person to whom the warrant was issued or assigned; so that the locator could acquire no title in his own name except by a regular assignment. [339]

When an entry is surveyed its boundaries are designated, and nothing can be more reasonable and just than that these shall limit the claim of the locator. To permit him to vary his lines so as to affect injuriously the rights of others subsequently acquired, would be manifestly in opposition to every principle of justice. [340]

Since locations were made in the Virginia military district in Ohio, it has been the practice of locators, at pleasure, to withdraw their warrants, both before and after surveys were executed. This practice is shown by the records of the land-office, and is known to all who are conversant with these titles.

The withdrawal is always entered on the margin of the original entry as a notice to subsequent locators, and no reason is necessary to be alleged as a justification of the act. If the first entry be defective in its calls, or if a more advantageous location can be made, the entry is generally withdrawn. This change cannot be made to the injury of the rights of others, and the public interest is not affected by it. The land from which the warrant is withdrawn is left vacant for subsequent locators, and the warrant is laid elsewhere, on the same number of unimproved lands. [341]

As the records of the land-office are of great importance to the country, and are kept under the official sanction of the government; their contents must always be considered, and they are always received in courts of justice as evidence of the facts stated. [342]

Under the peculiar system of the Virginia land law, as it has been settled in Kentucky and in the Virginia military district in Ohio, by usages adapted to the circumstances of the country, many principles have been established which are unknown to the common law. A long course of adjudications has fixed these principles, and they are considered as the settled rules by which these military titles are to be governed. [343]

An entry, or the withdrawal of an entry, is in fact made by the principal surveyor at the instance of the person who controls the warrant. It is not to be presumed that this officer would place upon his records any statement which affected the rights of others at the instance of an individual who had no authority to act in the case. The facts, therefore, proved by the records, must be received as prima facie evidence of the right of the person at whose instance they were recorded; and as conclusive, in regard to such things, as the law requires to be recorded. [343]

*No principle is better settled than that [*333 the powers of an agent cease on the death of his principal. [344]

A location made in the name of a deceased person is void; as every other act done in the name of a deceased person must be considered. [345]

The withdrawal of an entry is liable to objection, subject to the rights which others may have acquired subsequent to its withdrawal having been entered in the land-office. This is required by principles of justice as well as of law. [347]

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Ohio.

James Galt, as heir to his brother Patrick Galt, the ancestor of the complainants, on the 6th day of August, 1787, made an entry for military lands in the Virginia reservation, in the following words: "No. 610, James Galt (heir) enters one thousand acres on part of a military warrant, No. 194, on the Miami River, beginning at the upper corner of Francis Wheeling's entry, No. 438, running up the river five hundred poles which reduced to a straight line; thence at right angles with the general course of the river, and with Wheeling's line for quantity."

The bill of the appellants stated that this entry was valid on the 15th of November, 1796, and that a survey under the same was made thereon agreeably to its calls; that James Galt died intestate prior to the 2d of March, 1807; and that posterior thereto Elias Langham, without any authority from James Galt or from the complainants, caused an entry of the withdrawal of four hundred acres to be made in the books of the surveyor; the effect of which was to render the residue of the entry of such a shape as that it could not be legally surveyed, the law requiring that the breadth of a survey shall be one-third of its length. Subsequent to this withdrawal, the four hundred acres which Langham attempted to have left vacant thereby, were located by Galloway, by entries of three hundred acres in his own name, and one hundred acres in that of Ladd, both of which were included in one survey made on the 18th of June, 1808; but afterwards, on the 20th of July, 1809, Galloway having caused the word "error" to be entered on the face of the plats of the survey of 1808, had separate surveys executed in his own name and in that of Ladd, and also caused a survey to be made for himself of six hundred acres of James Galt's entry 334] of August, 1787, of *one thousand acres, the part of the same, to withdraw which no attempt had been made by Elias Langham. A patent for the four hundred acres was obtained by Galloway, and he afterwards conveyed the land included in the same to different persons, who are made parties to the bill. The bill also stated that Thomas Baker resides on part of the one thousand acres, claiming title under Joshua Collet. That Collet claims title to part; that William Patterson is in possession of, claiming title to the residue; and that Galloway refuses to withdraw the four hundred acres. The complainants say they cannot procure a patent for the six hundred acres without jeopardizing their title not only to the four hundred acres, but also to the six hundred acres; and pray for particular and general relief.

The answer of James Galloway, Jun., states that Langham withdrew the four hundred acres of Galt's entry of one thousand acres; and that he believes the withdrawal was authorized, but knows not by whom; and, that since the bill was filed, he has heard the same was authorized by Westfall. The survey on the six hundred acres, the residue of Galt's entry, he says, he executed and returned, and that he was at the time he made the same, a regular deputy under Anderson. He obtained a patent for three hundred acres of the land included in the patent, and sold the same.

Joshua Collet and William Patterson, in their answers, claim to hold title under Westfall; the same having been sold as his property for his debts or responsibilities. Patterson represents, that he believes Westfall made a contract with Galt for the whole of warrant No. 194, on a part of which his claim is founded; and that Westfall obtained patents in his own name for other entries on the warrant, and sold them for his own benefit.

Elias Langham answers that, at the request of Westfall, he withdrew the four hundred acres as charged. He believed Westfall purchased the warrant No. 194 from Galt, in his lifetime. He considered himself in possession of the whole, as agent of Westfall, except one thousand acres transferred to Mallow from 1797, and never heard of complainants' claim 335] *until after the death of Westfall. By order of Westfall, he laid off the town of Westfall, in Pickaway County, and sold several small tracts of land, part of warrant No. 194; and that he contracted with Westfall to withdraw and re-enter other lands, which entitled him to six hundred acres.

Evidence was exhibited intended to show that an impression prevailed generally that Westfall was entitled to half of Galt's military land warrant. That Galt's warrant was put into Westfall's hands to locate land. The opinion of the court states such parts of the testimony and other facts of the case as were considered made out by proof.

The Circuit Court of Ohio gave a decree against the complainants, and they appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Irvin for the appellants, and by Mr. Doddridge, contra.

For the appellants, it was contended:

1. That the entry in question of one thousand acres was originally good and valid.
2. That the original survey of one thousand acres included the lands embraced in said entry.
3. That James Galt, in whose name the said entry and survey were made, died intestate; and that the appellants are his heirs-at-law.
4. That on the death of said Galt, a right to three thousand acres, part of warrant No. 194, and of the lands appropriated thereby (which includes the land in question) vested in the appellants as his heirs-at-law.
5. That their right to the lands in question is not destroyed by either,

1st. Langham's attempt to withdraw four hundred acres, part thereof; or 2d. The locations made in the name of Galloway and Ladd, on the part of said entry, so attempted to be withdrawn, and the surveys and patents on said entries; or 3d. The conveyances from Galloway to Stephenson and the Gibsons, and from Ladd's executor to Wilson; or 4th. The conveyance bond executed by Westfall to Armstrong, and assigned by him to Davis, and by Davis to Patterson; or *5th. The proceedings in attachment against Westfall, and the sale and conveyance to Collet.

Mr. Irvin argued that there was no legal evidence to show that any authority had been given by Galt, the ancestor of the appellants, to anyone to withdraw his entry. The declarations of Westfall that he had received such authority were not evidence that it had been given, and the declarations of an agent cannot be used against his principal unless within the scope and purpose of his authority. A power to locate the entries did not authorize their revocation, nor did it give to the agent the right to dispose of the property or make it his own. If any power was given by James Galt to Westfall or to any other person, it should be shown. He who asserts it must make it out by evidence. If the contents of the instrument, which is said to have given the power, are to be proved by parol evidence, its nonproduction should be accounted for. (Cited, 8 East, 550; 7 Wheat., 154; Phil., 77, 79; 2 Taunt., 21.)

The removal of the warrant and entry was thus without authority. Langham acted under Westfall, and Westfall had no authority to give to Langham to do what was done by him. The whole of the proceedings of Langham were therefore void, and no titles obtained under them can be valid against those whose legal and known rights were infringed by the fraudulent contract of pretended agents.

After the survey was made, the warrants became functi officio; the warrant merges in the survey, if the survey was authorized, but not otherwise. (1 Ohio Rep., 225; 3 Marsh. Ken. Rep., 501, 96; 1 Marsh., 129, 144; Hardin, 567.)

Can the defendants avail themselves of want of notice? The assignee of an equity is in no better condition than the assignor, and there is no proof in the case that Westfall owned an acre of the land. (Cited, 6 Wheat., 560; 1 Marsh., 144.)

Mr. Doddridge, for the defendants, contended:

1. That upon the whole case, the complainants have shown no title in themselves.

337* 2. As to Galloway and those claiming under him, that the four hundred acres being actually withdrawn on the surveyor's books vacated that quantity of the original entry; that they were not bound to look beyond the record, and are innocent purchasers, without notice.

3. That owing to the particular position of the one thousand acre entry, the withdrawal of four hundred acres necessarily left vacant the part located by Galloway.

The appellants have slept too long on their rights, if any existed. The bill was filed in 1831, and they have suffered too long a period to elapse without complaint on their part of those proceedings which are now claimed to be void. Under those proceedings sales had been made; bona fide titles for a full and valuable consideration had been acquired by the defendants; all of which are to be vacated and defeated if the claims of the appellants prevail. He contended that as to the four hundred acres, the conduct of the surveyor in withdrawing this part of the survey was in accordance with a practice of universal prevalence, nor was it required by the law of Virginia that, to transfer a warrant, a regular assignment of it should be made. This principle was recognized by this court in the case of Bouldin and Wife v. Massie's Heirs et al. (7 Wheat., 122). It may, therefore, be well presumed that the acts of Westfall were authorized; that he had an interest in the warrants; and, therefore, what was done by Langham was correct. When an entry is made on the books of the office by the principal surveyor, it must be supposed valid; especially at a great distance of time, unless the contrary be plainly proved.

The land law of Virginia, which regulates this case, does not support the position that a warrant surrendered is functus officio. (7 Wheat., 23; Vir. Laws, 326, secs. 19, 24, 32, 42, 38.)

Mr. Justice McLEAN delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought to this court by an appeal from the Circuit Court of the District of Ohio.

The complainants claimed through their ancestor, James Galt, one thousand acres of land 338 under a military warrant obtained by him as heir to his brother, Patrick Galt. The entry was made on the 6th of August, 1787, as follows: "No. 610, James Galt, heir, enters one thousand acres on part of a military warrant, No. 194, on the Miami River; beginning at the upper corner of Francis Whiting's entry, No. 438, running up the river five hundred poles, when reduced to a straight line; thence at right angles with the general course of the river, and with Whiting's line for quantity."

On the 15th of November, 1796, the entry was surveyed agreeably to its calls, and the survey was recorded on the 31st of May, 1798. James Galt died intestate in 1800. In 1805 Elias Langham (under the authority, as he alleges in his answer, of Westfall, who made the original entry) withdrew four hundred acres of the warrant, on this entry, and located the same number of acres at another place, in the name of James Galt, heir, &c.

The four hundred acres left vacant by this withdrawal were located by James Galloway, Jun.; three hundred acres of which were entered in his own name, and one hundred acres in the name of J. Ladd. These entries were surveyed on the 20th of July, 1809, after Galloway had caused to be made a survey of the six hundred acres, which remained of the entry in the name of Galt. A patent was issued on the entries and surveys of Galloway, and he has conveyed to four of the defendants, each, one hundred acres. Thomas Baker and William Patterson are in possession of, and claim title to the six hundred acres in the name of Galt. Baker's claim originated by a sale under an attachment against Westfall, and Patterson's by a purchase from him; but he does not appear, from the facts in the case, to have had any interest in the land.

There is no evidence that Galloway had any agency in the withdrawal of a part of the entry, as stated by Langham. The complainants allege that the withdrawal of the four hundred acres will invalidate the residue of the entry; as a survey, agreeably to its calls, will give the six hundred acres an illegal form. They pray for such general and particular relief as the nature and circumstances of their case may require.

*It is contended by the defendants' 339 counsel that no relief can be given against the defendants, who claim title to the six hundred acres, as by the facts stated in the bill it clearly appears they have no title either equitable or legal. That the sale under the attachment could convey no title to Collet, as Westfall had no claim whatever to the land; and that Baker and Patterson, who are now in possession, must be considered as trespassers. These occupants can be considered in no other light by the court than intruders; and the remedy against them is at law, and not in chancery. No decree could be made against them, unless it be that they should deliver possession of the premises; and to obtain this, the action of ejectment is the appropriate remedy.

Jurisdiction of this branch of the cause cannot be taken as an incident to the other, for it does not appear that the withdrawal of the four hundred acres will destroy the entry for the residue; and if it did, it would only be necessary to relieve against the defendants who held the legal title, to restore to the complainants the means of perfecting their title to the six hundred acres.

It appears that a land warrant, numbered one hundred and ninety-four, for six thousand acres, was issued to James Galt, heir-at-law and legal representative of Patrick Galt, deceased. That this warrant was placed in the hands of Westfall, who located it on various tracts of land, including the tract in controversy.

In 1798, three thousand acres of this warrant were assigned by Galt to Westfall. The assignment was made on three surveys, which had been executed under these entries; one of these surveys was assigned by Westfall to Adam and Henry Mallow, and on all of them patents have been issued.

The possession of the warrant by Westfall is the only evidence of his right to make the locations; and this has been uniformly considered, at the land-office, as a sufficient authority. Letters of attorney were seldom, if ever, given to locators; because they were deemed unnecessary.

The entry could only be made in the name of the person to whom the warrant was issued [340*] or assigned, so that the *locator could acquire no title in his own name, except by a regular assignment.

The power of Westfall to make the location is not contested; but the validity of the withdrawal is denied by the complainants, on two grounds:

1. That the warrant had become merged in the survey, and could not be withdrawn.
2. That Langham had no power to withdraw it.

Several authorities have been referred to in support of the first position. Much reliance is placed on the decision in the case of Estill et al. v. Hart's Heirs, reported in Hardin, 567. In their opinion the court in that case say, that "whatever doubts might be raised as to the particular time at which the warrant shall be said to be merged in the survey, whether from the time it is approved by the chief surveyor and recorded, or from the time it was delivered out to the owner; or from the end of three months after making the survey, we conceive the case clear, that, after registering, the warrant was no longer an authority to any surveyor to receive an entry or make another survey."

The right of withdrawing a warrant, after a survey had been executed, was not involved in this case.

Two entries were made by Hart—one in 1780, the other in 1782—and both were surveyed in 1784. Boon subsequently entered land adjoining these surveys. Some years after this was done, Hart's executor and one of his heirs caused another survey to be made of the entries of his ancestor, which, varying from the former surveys, covered a part of Boon's land. The court decided, and very properly, that the second survey was void. When an entry is surveyed, its boundaries are designated, and nothing can be more reasonable and just than that these shall limit the claim of the locator. To permit him to vary his lines so as to affect injuriously the rights of others subsequently acquired, would be manifestly in opposition to every principle of justice.

In the case of Lofthus et al. v. Mitchel (3 Marsh., 598), it is laid down by the court that a survey made by a person without the authority [341*] of the owner of the entry, does not merge the warrant. The same principle is recognized in the case of Galloway's Heirs v. Webb (1 Marsh., 130). In the case of Taylor v. Alex- Peters 4.

ander (3 Marsh., 501), the court decided that a second survey of the same entry was void.

It will be perceived that none of the authorities cited sustain the position that a warrant cannot be withdrawn after the survey has been executed and recorded. If the warrant merge in the entry, and the entry in the survey, as laid down in some adjudications, and if the warrant, being once merged, is beyond the control of the owner, an entry, equally with a survey, would prevent a withdrawal of the warrant.

Since locations were made in the Virginia military district in Ohio, it has been the practice of locators, at pleasure, to withdraw their warrants, both before and after surveys were executed. This practice is shown by the records of the land-office, and is known to all who are conversant with these titles.

The withdrawal is always entered on the margin of the original entry, as a notice to subsequent locators; and no reason is necessary to be alleged as a justification of the act. If the first entry be defective in its calls, or if a more advantageous location can be made, the entry is generally withdrawn.

This change cannot be made to the injury of the rights of others, and the public interest is not affected by it. The land from which the warrant is withdrawn, is left vacant for subsequent locators; and the warrant is laid elsewhere, on the same number of acres, of unappropriated land.

In the case of Taylor's Lessee v. Myers, reported in 7 Wheat., 23, one of the questions considered and settled was, "can the owner of a survey, made in conformity with his entry, and not interfering with any other person's right, abandon his survey after it has been recorded?" The Chief Justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "It seems to be an ingredient in the character of property that a person who has made some advances towards acquiring it may relinquish it, provided the rights of others be not affected by such relinquishment. This general principle derives great strength from the usage which [342*] has prevailed among these military surveys. The case states that it has been customary, ever since the year 1799, to withdraw surveys after they have been recorded. The place surveyed has, of course, been considered as having become vacant; and has been appropriated by other warrants, which have been surveyed and carried into grant."

In that case the court did not decide (because it was unnecessary to do so) that the warrant thus withdrawn could again be located; but this would follow as a matter of course. If the withdrawal leave vacant the land entered, the warrant remains unsatisfied, and may be again located on any other unappropriated land.

It appears, therefore, that the right of the owner to withdraw his warrant after the survey has been executed and recorded, is clear, both on principle and authority.

The power of Langham to make the withdrawal is the next point to be considered.

Possession of the warrant, as has been shown, is a sufficient authority to make the location, and it will not be questioned that the locator may amend his entry by changing its calls. If he may do this, he may withdraw it, and make a new location. The control which he must necessarily exercise over the warrant cannot, consistently with the interest of the owner, be limited to the first attempt at making an entry. If that attempt be imperfect, or if the selection of the land be less advantageous to his employer than it might be, there is no reason why he should not change the entry. The authority necessarily extends to the withdrawal, as fully as to the location, and such has been the uniform construction of the power of the locator. Confidence is reposed in his knowledge and discretion, and he has only to act in good faith to bind his principal.

The register of the land-office keeps a record of all entries and surveys, and on his official certificates patents are issued by the government. His records are always under his control; and all entries made in them are made by himself, or by a person authorized to act for him.

As the records of this office are of great importance to the country, and are kept under the official sanctions of the government, their contents must always be considered, and they are always received in courts of justice as evidence of the facts stated.

If a different rule were now to be established, and every act of the locator, in making an entry or withdrawing it, must be shown to have been done under a formal letter of attorney, it would destroy, in all probability, a majority of the titles not carried into grant.

Under the peculiar system of the Virginia land law, modified as it has been in Kentucky and in the Virginia military district in Ohio by usages adapted to the circumstances of the country, many principles have become established which are unknown to the common law. A long course of adjudications has fixed these principles, and they are considered as the settled rules by which these military titles are to be governed.

An entry, or the withdrawal of an entry, is in fact made by the principal surveyor at the instance of the person who controls the warrant. It is not to be presumed that this officer would place upon his records any statement which affected the rights of others at the instance of an individual who had no authority to act in the case. The facts, therefore, proved by these records, must be received as prima facie evidence of the right of the person at whose instance they were recorded, and as conclusive in regard to such things as the law requires to be recorded.

It will be in the power of an individual to rebut this presumption of authority in a person whose acts have been injurious to him and were unauthorized, by an exhibition of facts and circumstances.

In the case of Moore et al. v. Dodd et al., reported in 1 Marsh., 140, the withdrawal of an entry by administrators was declared to be void; as the right had descended to the heir, and the administrators had no control over it. That the withdrawal in that case was made at the instance of the administrators, appeared from the entry on the record.

Langham, in his answer, states that he made the withdrawal of the four hundred acres by the authority of Westfall. This withdrawal was made eighteen years after the date of the entry, and nine years after the survey was executed. So great a lapse of time from the entry to the withdrawal is a circumstance which must be considered as shaking the right of the locator; which depends, alone, upon his having located the warrant. In this case there is no positive evidence that Westfall, after the entry, exercised any agency over the land in the payment of taxes or in any other manner, until this withdrawal took place on the application of Langham.

The survey, which was executed by O'Connor in 1796, does not appear to have been done at the instance of Westfall; though, from his having made the entry, he may be presumed to have directed the survey.

From the answer of Patterson it appears that Westfall sold the three hundred acres claimed by him to one Davis, in the year 1806, and gave a bond with security for a title. It is now apparent that he had no claim to any part of the land in controversy. The right to the warrant for six thousand acres, by assignments on the surveys for three thousand acres, which seems to have been urged in the court below, is abandoned by the counsel in the argument here; and the power to withdraw the four hundred acres is rested on the first location of the warrant.

In the absence of any proof of right, the sale of a part of this tract by Westfall is an evidence of bad faith on his part; and tends to throw suspicion over the act of withdrawal. It is a well-settled principle that the locator, as such, has no right to sell the land.

It is in proof that James Galt, to whom the warrant issued, and in whose name the locations under it were made, died in 1800. The withdrawal was made in 1805, and the question is presented whether the decease of the owner of the warrant puts an end to the power of the locator.

No principle is better settled than that the powers of an agent cease on the death of his principal. If an act of agency be done subsequent to the decease of the principal, though his death be unknown to the agent, the act is void.

On the death of James Galt the land in controversy descended to his heirs, and there is no proof that they authorized Westfall to act in their behalf. If he had the power to withdraw any part of the warrant, it must have been derived from the single circumstance of his having had the control of the warrant when the entry was made.

Under ordinary circumstances, this power, as has been shown, would be sufficient. But it is a power which may be revoked or terminated by circumstances. The possession of the warrant is tantamount to a letter of attorney to make the entry, to alter or withdraw it, and to direct the survey; but is there no limitation when this authority under the warrant shall cease? Can it be safely considered as investing the locator with a higher power than a letter of attorney?

If the authority be in the nature of a power of attorney, and subject to the same principles of law, it ceased on the death of Galt. On that event, new interests sprung up which could not be controlled by the agent of the deceased. In the case of Hansford v. Minor's

Heirs (reported in 4 Bibb, 385), the court decided that, "after the death of Minor, as the law then stood, it was clearly irregular to survey the entry and obtain the grant in his name; but as he at that time had a devisable interest in the land, upon his decease that interest passed to Nicholas, the father of the appellees, and consequently the title ought regularly to have been perfected in his name."

By a statute of Kentucky, passed in 1792, lands granted to deceased persons descended to their heirs or devisees. This statute is not in force in Ohio, so as to give validity to the location in the name of James Galt of the four hundred acres withdrawn by Langham. This location having been made in the name of a deceased person, is believed to be void; as every other act done in the name of a deceased person must be considered.

An entry made in the name of a dead man is a nullity; as appears from the decision in the case of McCracken's Heirs v. Beall and Bowman (reported in 3 Marsh., 210); but such an entry in Kentucky, under the statute of 1792, enures to the benefit of the heirs of the deceased.

There is no pretense that the withdrawal 346 was made under *any authority from the heirs of Galt; such a presumption would be rebutted by the subsequent location of the four hundred acres in the name of the deceased. An attempt has been made to show that the heirs of James Galt claim all the lands in Ohio entered in his name; and among other tracts, the four hundred acres located by the withdrawn warrant. But no other proof of the fact has been adduced except the vague declarations of David Collens, an alleged agent of William T. Galt, who acted for the other heirs; and these are not evidence. If the heirs had sanctioned the withdrawal by claiming the new location, it would render the act valid; and if such evidence be in the power of the defendants, it should have been produced.

As the heirs are residents of another State, the lapse of time does not raise a very strong presumption against them.

No doubt can exist that Langham, in making the withdrawal, acted without authority; and the question is presented whether an act thus done shall bind the owners of the entry.

There is much plausibility and force in the argument that the entry of a withdrawal on the record, being notice to subsequent locators, must be held valid, though done without authority in favor of rights subsequently acquired, without notice of the improper withdrawal.

The law requires the principal surveyor to record entries and surveys; these, and any other matters which the law requires to be recorded, must be received as conclusive of the facts; and parol evidence cannot be received to invalidate them, unless fraud be shown. But the law does not require the withdrawal of an entry to be recorded. This is an act of the party, rendered essentially necessary to the regularity of entries; but it cannot be considered of as high validity as the record of an entry or survey.

It operates as a notice to subsequent locators, and must be received as prima facie evidence of the right of the person who caused Peters 4.

the withdrawal to be made. But unless the law had required the principal surveyor to judge of the authority by which the warrant is withdrawn, and to make *the with- [*347] drawal on his record, can it be considered as conclusive?

The principal surveyor may enter a withdrawal, as was done in the case under consideration, at the instance of an individual who has not the shadow of authority. If entries and surveys may be destroyed in this manner, they must be considered of little value. On the other hand, if the authority of a person who withdraws the warrant may be contested under any circumstances, entries subsequently made may be annulled.

In the latter case, however, it is always in the power of the locator, when he is about to enter a tract from which a warrant has been withdrawn, to ascertain at whose instance the withdrawal was made; and this fact will enable him to investigate the authority under which the act was done. If the withdrawal was made by the owner of the warrant or the person who located it, the authority would be unquestionable. In the latter case, a great lapse of time might create doubts whether the power of the locator had not terminated, and this would lead to particular inquiry.

If it appeared that the warrant had been withdrawn by a stranger, should not that circumstance put the subsequent locator on strict inquiry? He has the means of guarding his interests by reasonable diligence; and this the law always imposes.

But the owner of the original entry, if it may be withdrawn without authority, has no means by which his interests can be protected. The principal surveyor is not under his control; nor, by the usages of the office, is he answerable to him for damages. It seems, therefore, that the principles of justice, as well as of law, require the act of withdrawal to be liable to objection, within the limits above prescribed.

As the withdrawal in this case was without authority, it was a void act, and, consequently, no right was acquired by the subsequent location.

The decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed, so far as relief is denied against Baker and Patterson, who are in possession of the six hundred acres; and reversed as to the *other defendants; and the cause is [*348] remanded to the Circuit Court, with instructions to decree that William Wilson, Andrew Gibson, Matthew Gibson, and William Stephenson, do, on or before the first day of November next, execute to the complainants, jointly or severally, a release of their interests in the premises; provided before that time they shall have been paid for their improvements, under the statute of Ohio. And the Circuit Court is hereby directed to proceed to ascertain the value of such improvements, agreeably to the above statute, each party to pay his own costs in this court.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Ohio, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court that the decree of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed, so far as relief is denied by the said court against Baker and Patterson, who are in possession of the six hundred acres of land; and that the said decree of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed as to the other defendants. And it is further ordered by this court that this cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said Circuit Court, with instructions to decree that William Wilson, Andrew Gibson, Matthew Gibson, and William Stephenson, do, on or before the first day of November of the year of our lord eighteen hundred and thirty, execute to the complainants, jointly or severally, a release of their interest in the premises; provided, that before that time they shall have been paid for their improvements, under the statute of Ohio. And that the said Circuit Court be, and the same is hereby directed to proceed to ascertain the value of such improvements, agreeably to the above statute. And that the said court do and act further in the premises as to law and justice may appertain. And it is further ordered by this court, that each party respectively in this court pay his own costs accruing in this court.

349*] *MARY RONKENDORFF, Plaintiff

v.

JAMES N. TAYLOR'S LESSEE, Defendant
in Error.

Official tax books as evidence—tax sales—Act of Congress authorizing such sales—sale of part of lot—tenants in common—insufficient advertisement.

The official tax books of the corporation of Washington, made by the register from the original returns or lists of the assessors laid before the Court of Appeals, he being empowered by the ordinances of the corporation to correct the valuations made by the assessors, are evidence; and it is not required that the assessor's original lists shall be produced in evidence to prove the assessment of the taxes on real estate in the city of Washington. [359]

In an ex-parte proceeding, as a sale of land for taxes under a special authority, great strictness is required. To divest an individual of his property against his consent, every substantial requisite of the law must be complied with. No presumption can be raised in behalf of a collector who sells real estate for taxes to cure any radical defect in his proceedings; and the proof of regularity devolves upon the person who claims under the collector's sale. [359]

Proof of the regular appointment of the assessors is not necessary. They acted under the authority of the corporation, and the highest evidence of this fact is the sanction given to their returns. [360]

The Act of Congress under which the lot in the city of Washington in controversy was sold, required that public notice of the time and place of sale of lots, the property of nonresidents, should be given by advertising "once a week" in some newspaper in the city, for three months. Notice of the sale of the lot in controversy was published for three months; but in the course of that period, eleven days at one time, at another ten days, and at another eight days transpired, in succeeding weeks, between the insertions of the advertisement in the newspapers. "A week" is a definite period of time, commencing on Sunday and ending on Saturday. The notice was published Monday, January 6th, and was omitted until Saturday, January 18th, leaving an interval of eleven days. Still the publication on Saturday was within the week preceding the notice of the 6th, and this was sufficient. It would be a most rigid construction of the act of Congress, justified neither by its spirit nor its language, to say that this notice must be published on any particular day of the week. If published once a week for three months, the law is complied with and its object effectuated. [361]

No doubt can exist that a part of a lot may be sold for taxes where they have accrued on such part. [361]

The lot on which the taxes were assessed belonged to two persons as tenants in common. The assessment was made by a valuation of each half of the lot. To make a sale of the interest of one tenant in common for unpaid taxes valid, it need not extend to the interest of both claimants; one having paid his tax, the interest of the other may well be sold for the balance. [361]

The advertisement purported to sell "half of lot No. 4, in square No. 491," and the other half was advertised in the same manner, as belonging to the other tenant in common. This was not a sufficient advertisement, and a sale made under the same was void. [362]

It is not sufficient that in an advertisement of land for sale for unpaid taxes, such a description is given as would enable the person desirous of purchasing to ascertain the situation of the property by inquiry; nor, if the purchaser at the sale had been informed of every fact necessary to enable him to fix a value upon the property would the sale be valid unless the same information had been communicated to the public in the notice. [362]

The tenth section of the act of Congress provides that real property in Washington, on which two or more years' taxes shall be due and unpaid, may be sold, &c. In this section a distinction is made between a general and a special tax. Property may be sold to pay the former as soon as two years' taxes shall be due; but to pay the latter, property cannot be sold until the expiration of two years after the second year's tax becomes due. The taxes for which the property in controversy was sold became due, by the ordinance of the corporation, on the 1st day of January, 1821 and 1822. The special tax for paving was charged against the lot in 1820 and became due on the 1st of January, 1821; but the ground on which it was assessed was not liable to be sold for the tax until the 1st of January, 1823. The first notice of the sale was given on the 6th of December, 1822, nearly a month before the lot was liable to be sold for the special tax of 1820. Held, that the whole period should have elapsed which was necessary to render the lot liable to be sold for the special tax, before the advertisement was published. [364]

FROM the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the County of Washington.

This was an ejectment, brought by the defendant in error in the Circuit Court for the recovery of an undivided moiety of a lot of ground in the city of Washington, No. 4, in square No. 491.

The lessor of the plaintiff in the ejectment claimed to be entitled to the lot of ground as tenant in common with the heirs-at-law of Henry Toland, deceased; and on the 10th of March, 1823, the half of the lot so held by the lessor of the plaintiff was set up and exposed to public sale as assessed to James N. Taylor, for taxes due to the corporation of Washington for the years 1820 and 1821, amounting in the whole, including the expenses of the sale, to the sum of forty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; and Henry T. Weightman became the purchaser of the same. Mary Ronkendorff, the plaintiff in error, holds as lessee under the purchase at the tax sale.

NOTE.—As to sales of lands for taxes, and execution of powers in regard to same, see note to Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat., 77; and note to Clark v. Graham, 6 Wheat., 577.

In the Circuit Court the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the ejectment, upon which judgment for his unexpired term in an undivided moiety of the lot as tenant in common was rendered in his favor under the instructions of the court, to which several exceptions were taken.

351 *] The plaintiff in the Circuit Court made out his title under the commissioners of the city of Washington, by regular conveyances to himself and Henry Toland, deceased; and it was agreed that the plaintiff's lessee and Toland's heirs were under the same seized in fee as tenants in common of the premises before the sale of the half lot for taxes.

The defendant proved the assessment of the taxes on the lot by the production of the regular evidence, and that the taxes were assessed and the assessments were entered in the tax books, according to the forms usually pursued and authorized under the charter and ordinances of the corporation of Washington.

In the tax book of 1820, the assessment of lot No. 4, in square No. 491, appears arranged in columns in the established and accustomed forms, in which are placed the name and residence of the owner of the property, the number of the square, the number of the lot, its contents in square feet; the rate of assessment, the valuation, the valuation of the improvements and the amount of the tax. The lot in controversy was entered in the tax book of 1820 thus:

| Names. | No. of square. | No. of lot. | No. of square feet. | Rate of assessment. | Valuation. | Total amount. | Amount of Tax. |
|------------------|----------------|-------------|---------------------|---------------------|------------|---------------|----------------|
| Taylor, James N. | 491 | ½ 4 | 4202 | 40 | 1680 | 1680 | |
| Paving tax, | | | | | | 8 40 | |
| Toland's heirs, | | | | | | 23 46 | 31 86 |
| Henry, | 491 | ½ 4 | 4202 | 40 | 1680 | 1680 | 8 40 |

In the tax book for 1821, the assessments of the lot were entered as follows:

| | | | | | | | |
|------------------|-----|-----|------|----|------|------|------|
| Taylor, James N. | 491 | ½ 4 | 4202 | 40 | 1680 | 1680 | 8 40 |
| Henry, | 491 | ½ 4 | 4202 | 40 | 1680 | 1680 | 8 40 |

It was also proved, on the part of the defendant in the ejectment, that the persons appointed to take the value of the property liable to assessments for taxes in the city of Washington usually perform the duty in October in each 352 *] year, and make out annual lists of the same and of its assessed value; which, after being laid before the board of appeal empowered to correct the valuations, are returned to the register of the corporation with the corrections, if any, in whose custody and office the original books containing such lists and valuations are preserved; and the register, by the authority of the corporation, then proceeds to digest the tax books, year by year, in the form described, and transfers into such tax books, from the original assessment books so returned by the assessors through the board of appeal, the lists of the several species, descriptions and parcels of property on which such taxes are imposed, and the assessed valuation of the same, as corrected by the board of appeal; extending in the proper column prepared for the purpose, the amount of the taxes imposed upon the same respectively; which tax books, given in evidence by the defendant, were so made up and arranged by the register in the years 1820 and 1821 respectively; the general taxes therein respectively assessed becoming due and payable, according to the laws of the corporation, on the first day of January of each year then next ensuing; that is to say, the general tax (exclusive of the special tax for paving) for the year 1820, on the 1st of January, 1821; and that for the year 1821, on the 1st of January, 1822.

The court, on the motion of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that the tax books so given in evidence by the defendant were not competent evidence to prove the assessments of the lot for the years 1820 and 1821, unless the defendant first proved the regular appointment and authority of the assessors whose books and returns were used in making up and arranging the tax books as aforesaid; and also produced the original books so returned by the assessors, through the board of appeal, in each year respectively; to which opinion and instruction of the court the defendant in the Circuit Court excepted.

It was further proved on the part of the defendant that the collector of the taxes imposed by the corporation in third and fourth wards, who was authorized to advertise and sell all property in those wards liable to be sold by taxes, on Monday, *the 6th of Decem- [353] ber, in the year 1822, the taxes on the lot in controversy being unpaid, caused to be inserted in the National Intelligencer, the following advertisement:

“ Will be sold at public sale on Monday, the 10th of March next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the City Hall, the following described property, to satisfy the corporation of Washington City for taxes due thereon up to the year 1821, inclusive, with costs and charges; unless previously paid to the subscriber, to wit:” (and amongst others are the following):

| To whom assessed. | No. of square. | No. of lot. | Amount. |
|----------------------------|----------------|-------------|---------|
| James N. Taylor, | 491 | ½ of 4 | $16 80 |
| Paving tax, in'st 10 p. c. | | | 23 46 |
| Henry Toland's heirs. | 491 | ½ of 4 | 16 80 |

This advertisement was repeated and republished by the direction of the collector, on the several days following:

Friday, December 6th, 1822; Saturday, December 14th, 1822; Monday, December 16th, 1822; Tuesday, December 17th, 1822; Wednesday, December 25th, 1822; Saturday, January 4th, 1823; Monday, January 6th, 1823; Saturday, January 18th, 1823; Tuesday, January 21st, 1823; Saturday, February 1st, 1823; Tuesday, February 4th, 1823; Thursday, February 6th, 1823; Saturday, February 8th, 1823; Tuesday, February 11th, 1823; Wednesday, February 12th, 1823; Thursday, February 13th, 1823; Friday, February 14th, 1823; Saturday, February 15th, 1823; Monday, February 17th, 1823;

Tuesday, February 18th, 1823; Wednesday, February 19th, 1823; Saturday, March 1st, 1823; Monday, March 3d, 1823; Tuesday, March 4th, 1823; Wednesday, March 5th, 1823; Monday, March 10th, 1823.

The tenth section of the Act of Congress of the 15th May, 1820, "to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal all other acts heretofore passed," requires that real estate upon which two years' taxes are unpaid and in arrear, shall be advertised "once a week" for three months.

In pursuance of his authority and duty, and according to the tenor of the advertisement, the 354 collector, on the 10th of *March, 1823, set up at public sale one-half of the lot No. 4, in square No. 491; and the same having been purchased by Henry T. Weightman, he paid the amount of the purchase money on the 11th of March, 1823, to the collector, who thereupon executed and delivered to him a certificate under his hand and executed in the presence of a witness, stating, that "at a sale made by me, as collector of taxes for the third and fourth wards of the city of Washington, on the 10th of March, 1823, after due notice given as required by the acts of the corporation of said city, I set up and exposed to public sale, half of lot No. 4, in square No. 491, assessed to James N. Taylor, for taxes due the said corporation on the same for the years 1820 and 1821, amounting in the whole, including the expenses of sale, to the sum of forty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; when a certain Henry T. Weightman, being the highest bidder, became the purchaser thereof, at and for the sum of forty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; the receipt of forty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents is hereby acknowledged, subject, however, to redemption, as provided for by law."

The collector made a return of the sale in the following form:

| Sqr. | Lot. | To whom assessed. | Purchaser. |
|------|------|-------------------|------------------|
| 491 | ½ 4 | James N. Taylor. | H. T. Weightman. |

| Tax. | Expen. | Am. sold for. |
|-------|--------|---------------|
| 45 33 | 2 58 | 47 91 |

Mr. Weightman entered upon the half lot so sold to him, and was possessed thereof more than two years after the day of sale; and afterwards, on the 5th of October, 1826, received in due form a conveyance in fee-simple of the said half lot, which deed was duly recorded; the plaintiff's lessor, James N. Taylor, or any person for him or in his behalf, or any person whatever, not having at any time paid or in any manner tendered to Mr. Weightman, or deposited in the hands of the mayor or other officer of the corporation, the money paid to the collector or any part thereof.

The court, on the motion of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that the advertisement of the property was defective and illegal in the several instances and particulars following, to wit:

*1. That being published and re-355 published as aforesaid, on the several days aforesaid, from the 6th of December, 1822, to the 17th of March, 1823, both inclusive, was not an advertisement "once a week" for three months within the meaning of the tenth section of the Act of Congress passed on the 15th of May, 1820, "to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose."

2. That the said corporation or its collector of taxes acting under its authority was not competent to advertise and sell any part of the said lot No. 4, in square No. 491, less than the entire lot, for the taxes so assessed on the same and due to the said corporation.

3. That the entire lot should have been assessed to the two tenants in common, Taylor and Toland, and accordingly advertised and sold as assessed to them.

4. That the said advertisement did not sufficiently designate what half of the said lot was charged with the said taxes, and was to be sold for the same; and did not purport to be an advertisement of an undivided moiety of the same for sale.

5. That the said corporation or its said collector had no power or authority to advertise the said lot for sale till the last of the two years' taxes, for which the same was advertised for sale, had remained unpaid and in arrears for two years.

6. That the said advertisement does not purport to advertise the said lot for two years' taxes unpaid and in arrears.

7. That the said property so attempted to be sold was not described with sufficient certainty, either in the advertisement or at the sale.

For which several defects in the process of the assessment, advertisement and sale of the said lot, the said sale is illegal and void.

The defendant excepted to all these instructions and opinions of the court, and prosecuted this writ of error.

The case was argued by Mr. Jones for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Barrell and Mr. Key for the defendant.

Mr. Jones*, for the plaintiff in error, 356 contended that the objections to the sale which had been made for taxes of the moiety of the lot were untenable.

The taxes for which the sale had been made had been regularly assessed under the authority of the corporation of Washington, and in conformity to law; all the forms of the law and ordinances had been complied with in this assessment—the registering of the taxes, the advertisement, and the sale. He cited the charter and ordinances of the corporation in support of that position.

Mr. Barrell and Mr. Key, for the defendant, contended that no proof had been made on the trial in the Circuit Court of the assessment of the taxes. The original books of the assessors should have been produced, and not the statements or abstracts from them made by the register. There may have been alterations made on appeals, and the original books of the assessors were the only legal evidence.

Laws for the sale of lands for taxes should be construed strictly, and their provisions should be strictly pursued. They are penal in their nature and effects. They go to wrest the property of the owner out of his hands by act of law; and every form which the law directs must be entirely and fully answered. (8 Wheat., 682.)

The description of the property was imperfect; it did not designate the part of the lot to be sold with sufficient, if with any precision. If the corporation could divide a lot (which is denied) in order to comply with the law, there should have been an assessment of a half lot, and a description of it as such. To show that such a description was insufficient, cited, 1 Har. & Gill., 172.

The publication of the advertisement was not made in conformity with the provisions of the charter. The tenth section directs that the advertisement shall be inserted once a week for three months, but the case shows that this was not done. A period of twelve days had elapsed between the days on which the advertisement appeared, and no more than seven days should have passed. Once a week means once in every seven days—from one day, a 357 particular day, to ^{*}another, a corresponding day in the succeeding week. In every period of seven days the insertion of the notice was not sufficient. If the advertisement commenced on one day in a week it should have been repeated on the following corresponding day in the succeeding week; and so on until it had been inserted for three months.

The stipulation to pay rent quarterly, and the construction given to such covenants, illustrate and explain the position of the defendant in error. Would it be a compliance with an agreement to pay two quarters' rent, quarterly, to make the payment at any time within six months, being two quarters? The payments are to be made under such covenant from quarter-day to quarter-day; and there is a breach, if the corresponding and succeeding quarter-day is suffered to pass without payment being made.

It was also contended that the corporation had no authority to advertise the lot for sale until the last of the two years' taxes were due, for which the sale was to be made, and that the advertisement does not purport to expose the property to be sold for two years' taxes unpaid and in arrears.

Mr. Jones, in reply, argued that the books of the assessors were not the original records of the assessment of the taxes. The returns are made to the register and are entered by him, and his books exhibit regular and proper evidence of the charges and assessments on property in the city.

The register is a public, sworn officer, and the duties he performs are official acts, which are shown by his books.

The advertisement was inserted in every succeeding period of seven days, and this was a compliance with the law. It was a publication in every succeeding week, or space of seven days; and this was according to the letter of the charter.

When a term is fixed for the performance of an act, the whole time is allowed to do it; even to the last minute. So, to require advertising once a week, gives all the next week for the next advertising. On what succeeding day in the hebdomadal division of a week the advertisement shall appear is not required; the name of the day of the week on which it must be published is of no moment, as the names of ^{*}the days of the week are arbitrary. [358 It is the period of seven days which the law regards as the space of a week, and in this case, as there was no period of fourteen days in which the notice of the sale was omitted, no longer period than twelve days having passed during the three months in which the advertisement did not appear, all was regular. As to the objection that the property sold had not been sufficiently described; as the powers of the corporation are to tax all interest in lands, the right to assess the tax on an undivided moiety of a tenant in common cannot be denied. Such was this case, and the advertisement described sufficiently an undivided half of the lot of which Taylor was the owner with Toland's heirs.

Mr. Justice M'LEAN delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error is prosecuted to reverse a judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

The defendant in error brought an action of ejectment in the Circuit Court, to recover possession of lot 4, in square No. 491, in the city of Washington, half of which had been sold for taxes; and under the special instructions of the court recovered a verdict and judgment. Several exceptions were taken to the competency of the evidence admitted on the trial, all of which appear in the bill of exceptions.

The first objection was taken to the competency of the proof of the assessment of the lot for taxation: the legality of the tax is not disputed.

To show the taxes assessed on the lot for the years 1820 and 1821, the defendant below produced in evidence the official tax books of the corporation, regularly made up by its officers, from which it appeared that the plaintiff stood charged for 1820 with thirty-one dollars eighty-six cents for the tax on the half of lot No. 4, which contained four thousand two hundred and two square feet, valued at one thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. For the year 1821, he stood charged with eight dollars forty cents tax on the same lot. It appeared in proof that the assessors appointed by the authority of the corporation make a valuation of ^{*}property within the city [359 about the month of October, annually, and a return of their proceedings, which are laid before the board of appeal empowered to correct the valuations of the assessors according to the laws and ordinances of the corporation. The assessment lists are then returned to the register of the corporation. The register then proceeds to make out the tax books from the original assessment lists returned by the assessors and corrected by the board of appeal. But it was contended that the original lists of the assessors must be produced, and also proof of their appointment.

The court recognize the correctness of the principle contended for by the counsel for the plaintiff in error—that in an ex-parte proceeding of this kind, under a special authority, great strictness is required. To divest an individual of his property against his consent, every substantial requisite of the law must be shown to have been complied with. No presumption can be raised in behalf of a collector who sells real estate for taxes, to cover any radical defect in his proceeding, and the proof of regularity in the procedure devolves upon the person who claims under the collector's sale.

In this case, was it necessary to exhibit proof of the regular appointment of the assessors? They acted under the authority of the corporation, and the highest evidence of this fact is the sanction which it has given to their return. This return has been examined and corrected by the board of appeal, and was then handed over to the register. What better proof can be required of the assessor's authority to act?

The municipal powers of the corporation are conferred by a public law, and all courts are bound to notice them. Is it necessary in any case to go into the proof of the election of the mayor, or any of the other officers of this corporation? This has not been contended, nor can it be necessary to prove the appointment of an officer of the corporation who has acted under its authority, and whose proceedings, as in the present case, have received its express sanction.

Did the court below err in requiring the original assessment lists to be produced?

These lists, under the law, were not conclusive 360 on the *corporation or on the person whose property was assessed. They were laid before the Court of Appeal for their correction and sanction, and they were then passed to the register.

If the assessment was not conclusive, or indeed binding on either party until sanctioned by the board of appeal, then, without this sanction, the assessment lists could not be received as evidence. These lists being handed over to the register, the law requires him to furnish a tax book to the collector from the original assessment lists on file in his office, according to a prescribed form. This was done in the case under consideration; and is not this book evidence?

It was made out and arranged by an officer, in pursuance of a duty expressly enjoined by law. This not only makes the tax book evidence, but the best evidence which can be given of the facts it contains. In this book are stated the name of the owner of the property and his residence, if known; the number of the square, the number of the lot, the square feet it contains; the rate of assessment, the valuation, and the amount of the tax. Only a part of these appear upon the assessment list.

This court think that the Circuit Court erred in their instructions to the jury on both of the points stated. 1. In deciding that the proof was not competent to show the authority of the assessors, and 2. That the official tax book certified by the register did not prove an assessment of the property.

The next point presented by the bill of exceptions is as to the legality of the notice of sale given by the collector.

The court instructed the jury that the advertisement was defective in several particulars.

By the tenth section of the Act of Congress, which directs this proceeding, the collector is required to give public notice of the time and place of sale by advertising once a week in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington for three months, when the property is assessed to a person who resides within the United States, but without the District of Columbia.

Notice of the sale of the lot in controversy was given by the collector; first, in a newspaper published the 6th of December, *1822, [361] and last in the same paper of the 10th of March, 1823. These periods embrace the time the advertisement is required to be published; but it is contended that the notice was not published once in each week, within the meaning of the Act of Congress.

In examining the dates of the publications, it appears that eleven days at one time transpired between them, and at another time ten days, at another eight.

These omissions, it is contended, are fatal: that the publication being once made, it was essential to the validity of the notice that it should be published every seventh day thereafter.

The words of the law are, "once a week." Does this limit the publication to a particular day of the week? If the notice be published on Monday, is it fatal to omit the publication until the Tuesday week succeeding? The object of the notice is as well answered by such a publication as if it had been made on the following Monday.

A week is a definite period of time—commencing on Sunday and ending on Saturday. By this construction the notice in this case must be held sufficient. It was published Monday, January the 6th, and omitted until Saturday, January the 18th, leaving an interval of eleven days; still the publication on Saturday was within the week succeeding the notice of the sixth.

It would be a most rigid construction of the act of Congress, justified neither by its spirit nor its language, to say that this notice must be published on any particular day of a week. If published once a week for three months, the law is complied with and its object effectuated.

The Circuit Court erred on this point in their instructions to the jury.

The court below also instructed the jury "that the corporation, or its collector of taxes acting under its authority, was not competent to advertise and sell any part of said lot No. 4 for the taxes assessed on the same."

By the law, not less than a lot, when the property upon which the tax has accrued is not less than that quantity, may be sold for the taxes due thereon.

*No doubt can exist that a part of a [362] lot may be sold for taxes where they have accrued on such part; it appears, therefore, that the Circuit Court have also erred on this point.

It is again objected "that the entire lot should have been assessed to the two tenants in common, Taylor and Toland, and accordingly advertised and sold, as assessed to them.

The same valuation was placed on each half of this lot; so that so far as the assessment goes, it did not substantially differ from the instruction given. But the sale, to be valid, need not extend to the interest of both claimants. One having paid his share of the tax, the interest of the other may well be sold for the balance. The court therefore erred in their instructions on this point also.

In their fourth instruction the court say to the jury "that the advertisement did not sufficiently designate what half of the said lot was charged with the said taxes, and was to be sold for the same, and did not purport to be an advertisement of an undivided moiety."

The law requires "the number of the lots (if the square has been divided into lots), the number of the square or squares, or other sufficient or definite description of the property selected for sale, to be stated in the advertisement."

Congress had two objects in view in requiring this notice to be given: 1. To apprise the owner of the property, and 2. To give notice to persons desirous of purchasing. These objects are important. It is necessary for the interest of the owner that he should be informed of a proceeding which, unless arrested by the payment of the tax, would divest him of his property. And it was of equal, if not greater importance, that the property should be so definitely described that no purchaser could be at a loss to estimate its value.

It is not sufficient that such a description should be given in the advertisement as would enable the person desirous of purchasing to ascertain the situation of the property by inquiry. Nor, if the purchaser at the sale had been informed of every fact necessary to enable him to fix a value upon the property, yet the sale would be void unless the same information had been communicated to the public in the notice. Its defects, if any exist in the description of 363] the *property to be sold, cannot be cured by any communication made to bidders on the day of sale by the auctioneer.

What was the description given in the advertisement of the property in controversy? It was described to be half of lot No. 4 in square No. 491, and the other half was advertised at the same time under the same description, as belonging to Toland's heirs.

What would be understood by such a description? Suppose half a square had been advertised, it not having been divided into lots, would it convey that certainty to the public as to the precise property about to be sold that would enable anyone to form an opinion of its value? No one could suppose that an undivided half of the square was to be sold under the notice, and which half was offered could not be determined from the advertisement. Would this be a notice under the requisites of the law?

The value of a lot or half lot depends upon its situation. If one of the half lots front two streets in a populous part of the city, it is of much higher value than the other half. And this difference in value may still be greater if the lot be situated near the middle of a square, fronting the street, and it be divided so as to cut off one-half of it from the street.

It will thus be seen that it is not a matter of small importance to the person who wishes to purchase to know which half of a lot is offered for sale; and as any uncertainty in this matter must materially affect the value of the property at the sale, it is of great importance to the owner that the description should be definite. That an undivided moiety of a lot may be sold for taxes has already been stated. But would anyone understand that one half of lot No. 4 means an undivided moiety?

Peters 4.

In all cities half lots are as common as whole ones, and when a half lot is spoken of, we understand it to be a piece of ground half the size of an entire lot, and of as definite boundaries.

The illustrations given show how great a difference in value may exist between halves of the same lot. And would not the preferable half be of much higher value than an undivided moiety of the entire lot?

*In every point of view in which [364 this notice can be considered, under the act of Congress, it was radically defective. The property should have been described as an undivided half of lot No. 4. Under such a description no one could be at a loss as to its situation and value. The instructions of the Circuit Court on this point are not erroneous.

In their fifth instruction the court say "that the corporation, or its collector, had no power or authority to advertise the said lot for sale till the last of the two years' taxes for which the same was advertised for sale had remained unpaid and in arrear for two years."

The tenth section of the Act of Congress which governs this subject provides "that real property, whether improved or unimproved, in the city of Washington, on which two or more years' taxes shall have remained due and unpaid; or on which any special tax, imposed by virtue of the authority of the provisions of this act, shall have remained unpaid for two or more years after the same shall have become due, may be sold, &c."

In this section a distinction is made between a general and a special tax. Property may be sold to pay the former, so soon as two years' taxes shall be due; but to pay the latter, property cannot be sold until the expiration of two years after the second year's tax becomes due.

The taxes for which the lot in controversy was sold were assessed in 1820 and 1821; and by the ordinance of the corporation they became due on the 1st of January succeeding the assessment.

A special tax for paving was charged against Taylor in 1820, and composed a part of the sum for which the property was sold.

This special tax became due on the 1st of January, 1821; but the ground on which it was assessed was not liable to be sold for the tax until the 1st of January, 1823. On the 1st of January, 1822, the same property was liable to be sold under the assessments of the years 1820 and 1821, for a general tax.

The first notice of the sale was given on the 6th of December, 1822, nearly a month before the lot was liable to be *sold for the [365 special tax of 1820. Does this render the notice invalid?

This court think that the whole period should have elapsed which was necessary to render the lot liable to be sold for special tax before the advertisement was published. That the owner of the lot, by paying the tax at any time before the 1st of January, 1823, would save it from the liability of being sold; and that until this liability had attached he could not be chargeable with the expense of notice, nor could it legally be given.

The Circuit Court, therefore, did not err in their instruction to the jury on this point.

The court also instructed the jury that the advertisement was defective, as it "does not purport to advertise the said lot for two years' taxes unpaid and in arrear." It states that the lot was offered for sale "for taxes due thereon up to the year 1821." This was sufficient; for if the taxes were due, and the property was liable to be sold for them, it can be of no importance to the purchaser to have a more technical description of the tax than the notice contained.

The seventh instruction, "that the said property attempted to be sold was not described with sufficient certainty either in the advertisement or at the sale," is substantially embraced by the fourth instruction, which has been considered.

For the errors specified the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause removed to that court for further proceedings, in conformity to this opinion.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, holden in and for the County of Washington, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court, that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that the cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said Circuit Court for further proceedings to be had therein, according to law and justice.

366*] *THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, Plaintiffs in Error,

v.

LEVI TYLER, Defendant in Error.

Promissory note, law of Kentucky as to assignment of—liability of indorser—judgment—when lien attaches to land—equitable interest, how reached by legal process—negligence of holder of note—case of Bank v. Weisiger confirmed.

Action by the indorsces against the indorser of a promissory note drawn and indorsed in the State of Kentucky.

The statute of Kentucky authorizing the assignment of notes is silent as to the duties of the assignee or the nature of the contract created by the assignment. It only declares such assignments valid, and the assignee capable of suing in his own name. But the courts of that State have clearly defined his rights, duties and obligations resulting from the assignment. The assignee cannot maintain an action on the mere nonpayment of the note and notice thereof until the holder of the note has made use of all due and legal diligence to recover the money from the drawer; whose engagement is held to be that he will pay the amount, if after due and diligent pursuit the maker is found insolvent. [380]

The principles of the law of Kentucky relative to the liability of indorsers of promissory notes, and proceedings to establish the same, as settled by the decisions of the courts of Kentucky. [381]

A judgment does not bind lands in the State of Kentucky. The lien attaches only from the delivery of the execution to the sheriff. It then binds real and personal property held by legal title. An execution returned is no lien on any property not levied on, and no new lien can be acquired, until a new execution is put into the hands of the sheriff; and none can issue while a former levy is in force. Any delay, then, by the assignee, enables the debtor to alienate his property in the interval between judgment and the execution reaching the sheriff, as well as between the return of one and the lien acquired by a new execution. [383]

By the law of Kentucky, no equitable interest in real or personal property, unless it is held by mortgage, deed of trust, or other incumbrance, can be taken in execution. A capias ad satisfaciendum is the only mode by which the equitable estate of a debtor or his choses in action can be in any way reached by any legal process. It may be the means of coercing the payment of the debt, and it must therefore be used. The return of nulla bona to an execution is in that State the only evidence of there being no property of the debtor on which a levy can be made. It is not evidence of there being no equitable interest which is beyond the reach of such process, or of his not having that kind of property on which a levy can be made. [383]

After judgment obtained in the Circuit Court of the United States against the drawer of the note, a capias ad satisfaciendum was issued against him by the holder, and he was put in prison. Two justices of the peace ordered his discharge, claiming to proceed according to the law of Kentucky in the case of insolvent debtors; and the jailer permitted him to leave the prison. The jailer made himself and his securities liable for an escape, by permitting the prisoner to leave the prison. Held, that the neglect of the holder of the note to proceed against the jailer and his securities, prevents his making of the indorser liable for the amount of the note. [388]

*The court find no express decision of the [*367 courts of Kentucky enjoining a plaintiff who has sued the drawer of a promissory note and intends to charge the indorser, to proceed against a jailer and his sureties when the defendant has been suffered to escape; yet by the spirit of all the decisions he is bound to do so. The general principle of all the cases is that a plaintiff must pursue with legal diligence all his means and remedies, direct, immediate or collateral, to recover the amount of his debt from the drawer of the note or of anyone else who has put himself, or has by operation of law been put in his place. [390]

The decision of this Court in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, examined and confirmed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This was an action by The Bank of the United States against Levi Tyler upon two promissory notes—one for three thousand nine hundred dollars, dated the 2d of May, 1821, and payable sixty days after date, drawn by Anderson Miller in favor of John T. Gray. It was negotiable and payable without defalcation at the office of discount and deposit of The Bank of the United States at Louisville, Kentucky, for value received. John T. Gray assigned the note to Levi Tyler, and Levi Tyler assigned it to the bank.

The other note was of the same date, for three thousand eight hundred dollars, payable to Samuel Vance; assigned by said Vance and by the defendant. In all other respects it was like the note above stated.

On the 24th of September, 1821, suit was brought by the bank against the drawer, Anderson Miller, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, for the first-mentioned note; and judgment was obtained at the November Term, 1821.

On this judgment a fiery facias issued, bearing date the 29th of December, 1821, returnable on the first Monday of March, being the 4th day of the month following, which was in the hands of the marshal on the 19th of January, 1822; and the plaintiffs introduced as a witness the clerk of the court, who stated that it had been his uniform habit, before and since the obtention of the said judgment, to issue executions on all judgments obtained at the last preceding term and place them in a window of his office, from whence it was the habit and custom of the marshal to take them. That it generally required from twelve to sixteen days after the 368 rising of the court to prepare and issue the executions of the preceding term. That at the November Term of the court at which the before-mentioned judgment was obtained, the court adjourned on the 17th of December.

To this fiery faeias the marshal returned a levy, and that he had not time to sell before the return day. The return was filed the 28th of March, 1822. On the 3d of April, 1822, a venditioni exponas issued, returnable the first Monday in June. It was returned on the 17th day of June, "unsold for want of bidders," and the sale was postponed; and alias venditioni exponas issued, tested the 17th of June, returnable on the first Monday in September, returned on the 13th. The sales, amounting to ten dollars and fifty cents, were credited to another execution.

The 26th of September, 1822, another fiery faeias issued, which was levied on slaves, and sale made. It was returned the 9th of December, 1822. The proceeds of the sale were one thousand three hundred dollars.

The 19th of December, 1823, another fiery faeias issued, and returned, "levied on property mentioned, and not sold for want of time." This was returned on the first Monday in March, 1823.

The 20th of March, 1823, a venditioni exponas issued, and was returned "unsold for want of bidders." The return was filed on the 30th of June, returnable the first Monday in June.

The 1st of July, 1823, another venditioni exponas issued, and was returned "unsold for want of bidders." The return was filed the 12th of September, 1823.

The 19th of September, 1823, another venditioni exponas issued, and the property was sold. The proceeds amounted to four dollars and fifty cents. It was returned the 19th of December, 1823.

The 19th of December, 1823, another fiery faeias issued to March, 1824, and was returned, "no property found to satisfy the execution or any part thereof." Returned the 16th of March, 1824.

The 16th of March, 1824, a capias ad satisfaciendum issued, under which the defendant 369 was committed, and so *returned on the 26th of April, 1824. The commitment was to March, 1824.

The proceedings in the suit against Anderson Miller on the other note were also given in evidence. They also terminated in his committal to prison.

On the 27th of March, 1824, two justices of Kentucky discharged Anderson Miller from prison.

Upon this evidence the court instructed the jury to find for the defendant; and the jury found accordingly. The plaintiffs excepted, and the judge signed a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiffs offered witnesses to prove that Anderson Miller was notoriously insolvent when the note fell due, and had so continued ever since. The court rejected the evidence and the plaintiffs excepted. This exception is stated in the bill.

The plaintiffs contend that the court erred in Peters 4.

charging the jury to find for the defendant, because they say it was fully proved that due diligence was used against the drawer; and the remedies afforded by the law were exhausted without obtaining the money, and therefore they were entitled to recover from the indorser.

They contend, also, that under the circumstances of this case, the evidence offered of Miller's insolvency ought to have been received.

The case was argued by Mr. Sergeant for the plaintiffs in error, and by Mr. Wickliffe and Mr. Bibb for the defendant.

Mr. Sergeant stated that the first question was, whether due diligence had been used.

The second, whether the proceedings have been carried so far as to establish the right of holders to sue the indorser or assignor of the note.

1. The principles of the case were settled at the last term, in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger (2 Peters, 331). They decide this point, at all events, and, it is thought, the whole case.

It is to be remarked that it appears on the face of these notes that they were drawn for the same purpose of discount; *they [370] were indorsed for the same purpose, and they were discounted for Levi Tyler for value received by him.

The diligence used in the commencement of the suit appears from the statement of the case. It was brought to the first term, and in time to obtain a judgment at that term. No case in Kentucky requires more than this. The holder is not obliged to run a race against time, nor to sue the first term, if judgment could not be obtained. The general phrase is, "it must be in reasonable time." (Trimble v. Webb, 1 Monroe, 100; Oldham v. Bengan, 2 Litt., 132; Collyer v. Whitaker, 2 Marsh., 197.)

Bail was demanded, which would be necessary if non est inventus was returned (1 Bibb, 542), but not otherwise. (2 Marsh., 197.) Tyler was the bail.

2. Judgment was obtained the first term, and a fiery faeias issued on the same day, and was on the same day in the hands of the sheriff. (2 Peters, 333, 348, 349.)

The fiery faeias in the second case is said not to have been in the marshal's hands until the 9th of January; but this is probably a mistake; and if it was not, it was in good time. (2 Peters, 348.) It was also immaterial, because the other fiery faeias covered the whole property, as the return shows, and there was nothing to levy upon.

Was it necessary to issue two writs of fiery faeias? From that time forward there was unceasing diligence, the process being followed up as fast as it was returned. It is true that the marshal returned he had not time to sell; but this is not because the writ came too late: it was because he found nothing to levy upon until the 27th of September, 1822, or perhaps it is the ordinary course. Tyler was connusant of all this, for he was one of the defendants in one of the three executions.

Suppose, however, the officer did wrong; are the plaintiffs responsible for that? It has never been so settled. (Postlethwaite v. Garrett, 3 Monroe, 346.) Nothing was lost by it; for the property was secured, such as it was, and a venditioni issued immediately in each case. The proceedings went on until the drawer was committed to prison, and that was all that could be done, and no more was required. (*Young v. 371 Cosby, 3 Bibb, 227.) Here the diligence was fairly exhausted and at an end. The bail was discharged by this commitment, and there was no recourse to him.

Have the proceedings been carried so far as to entitle the holder to sue the indorser or assignor?

It is contended that there is an immediate right of action against the indorser by the holder, after the confinement of the drawer, which cannot be devested but by his own act or consent. He is not bound to take a single step to keep the drawer in prison. (Young v. Cosby, 3 Bibb, 227.) Authorities upon this principle, 1 Marsh., 535; 2 Bibb, 34.

All this has been done, and the burden of proof that anything has been omitted is thrown upon the defendant. The plaintiffs are not bound to protract the imprisonment one moment. (Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, 2 Peters, 331.) In Virginia the requirements are far short of this. (Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142.)

Ought the law of Kentucky, which professes to be the law of Virginia, to be carried further than judicial decisions in that State have carried it? The point to be established is the insolvency of the drawer or his inability to pay, to a reasonable extent. Not that every possible chance of getting the money by any means is exhausted. That point was reached.

But it is insisted that a new career was to be begun. It is founded upon this argument—that the justices had no authority to discharge; that it was therefore an escape, and the jailer and his sureties are liable.

Supposing all this to be correct, is it necessary for the plaintiffs to proceed? It will be recollected that there was no request to this effect. There is no decided case which gives any countenance to the position. The case of a replevy bond has no analogy.

But this proceeding would be collateral to the suit. It would be a new departure on a different line of operations, the first suit being only the base.

Were the jailer and his sureties liable by the Kentucky law? This cannot be decided for want of evidence. Were there any sureties of *372 the jailer, and to what amount? *Were they responsible men, or were they insolvent? Was the pursuit worth the cost? The defendant should have shown this by evidence. He was to ask the pursuit to be undertaken at his cost and for his account. The claim on the plaintiffs seems wholly inadmissible.

But the question presented is one of some peculiarity. Is there an escape, and who is liable for it? This is a new question, considering the circumstances. The United States have no prison in Kentucky, nor is the marshal furnished with any place of imprisonment in Kentucky, under his own jurisdiction. The jailer is not of his appointment. The moment he delivers a prisoner to the jailer, his authority is at an end.

The matter depends on the resolutions of Congress and the acts of Kentucky. (Resolution of September 23d, 1789, Ing. Ab., 489; of March 3d, 1791, Ing. Ab., 496; of March 3d, 1821, Ing. Ab., 507; Acts of Kentucky, 2 Litt., 57, 369.) The marshal, therefore, cannot be liable. Is the jailer? He derives his authority from the State of Kentucky, and this discharge is under the law of Kentucky. It is a complicated question?

Two questions present themselves:

1. Is it required by the obligation of due diligence in Kentucky to issue a capias ad satisfaciendum for the purpose of imprisonment since the act abolishing imprisonment for debts? Does the law require that to be done which the same law declares ought not to be done?

2. Can a citizen of Kentucky, and one of the law makers, insist that this ought to be done? Suppose it to be clear that the plaintiffs had a right of action, were they bound to pursue it?

This is a question of evidence in the case, and it is contended the evidence was inadmissible. (Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142; 2 Marsh., 255; 2 Bibb, 34; 3 Bibb, 227.)

Mr. Wickliffe and Mr. Bibb, for the defendant.

This court has uniformly expressed its disposition to adopt the construction which the courts of a State have given of the laws of the State. (Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat., 160.)

*In this opinion the principle is clear. [373] ly recognized that the judicial department of every government is the appropriate expounder of the legislative acts of the government.

The law of Kentucky in relation to promissory notes is applicable to those notes which are the foundation of this action; for the notes were drawn and executed in that State, and there assigned. The law of Kentucky is different from the usual commercial law. The responsibility of an assignor is to accrue after due diligence by suit against the drawer. (Smallwood v. Woods, 1 Bibb, 544; Drake v. Johnson, Hard., 223; Duncan v. Littell, 2 Bibb, 35, 290.)

The statute of Kentucky which authorizes the assignment of such notes, omits the words “in the same manner as bills of exchange” contained in the statute of Anne. (1 Dig. Laws of Kentucky, 99.)

The declaration in this case treats the notes as assigned under the law of Kentucky, and the attempt of the plaintiff has been to make out a case of diligence under the Kentucky law, and this is essential to a recovery.

By the decisions of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, the responsibility of an assignor of a bond or note is made to depend upon due diligence by suit against the maker to compel payment. The assignor must use every compulsory process afforded by law, and he must use it until the insolvency of the maker of the note is established, until the suit and all the incidental remedies, however ramified, prove insufficient. (Smallwood v. Woods, 1 Bibb, 542; Hogan v. Vance, 2 Bibb, 35; 4 Bibb, 287; Marsh., 523; 3 Marsh., 60; 1 Mon., 103; 5 Litt., 331; 3 Bibb, 7; 1 Marsh., 230.)

From these cases the consequences are inevitable that a failure to sue out successive executions in due time until the officer returns “no property” is negligence; that the first and every successive process must be diligently pursued until the property is exhausted and the body taken, and all the remedies have been employed and have failed.

Due diligence is a question of law to the court, when the facts are ascertained. (McKenney v. McConnell, 1 Bibb., 239; Smallwood v. Woods, 544.)

374* In the case before the court, the facts were ascertained by the plaintiffs' evidence upon which the motion for instructions which prevailed was founded; the plaintiff produced none. The rules of the law of Kentucky being fully established upon the authorities cited, the principles they enforce will be applied to this case.

1. By showing that the plaintiffs as assignees have not used due diligence against the maker between the judgment and the capias ad satisfaciendum.

2. That the plaintiffs having failed to proceed against the jailer for an escape, cannot have recourse to the assignor.

1. The plaintiffs have been guilty of crassa negligentia between the judgment and the capias ad satisfaciendum.

If suit must be brought to the first term (4 Monroe, 15), why so? Because execution would otherwise be delayed. Not only suit, but execution must be sued in due time; and although a feri facias was sued in due time, yet a delay in pursuing the execution by capias ad satisfaciendum was adjudged negligence. (2 Marsh., 523.) What is due diligence? what is negligence in proceedings under executions must be tested by the properties and effects which the law gives to executions in respect to three subjects:

1. As to priority between creditors, where all cannot be satisfied.

2. In overreaching alienations by the debtor to bona fide purchasers.

3. As to the command to the officer to levy or compel the debtor, or the obedience due by the officer to the precept.

1 and 2. As to priority of lien amongst creditors and the lien which overreaches alienations by the debtor, the statutes of Virginia and of Kentucky declare that the property shall be bound only from the delivery of the execution to an officer; and to that end he is required to indorse the time of delivery. (Laws of Virginia, 1748, p. 276, sec. 10; Laws of Kentucky, 1 Dig., 513, 483.)

The common law doctrine of relation to the beginning of the term by judgments is abolished, and the lien commences as has been stated.

375* By the express provisions of the statutes, and decisions under them, it appears:

That if several executions issue at the same time against the same debtor, and are delivered to the same officer, that which comes first to the officer's hands must be first satisfied, and it does not bind until delivery.

An execution issued and delivered creates no lien after the return day, except upon such property as may have been seized. (Tabb v. Harris, 4 Bibb, 29; Daniel v. Cockpen's Executors, 4 Bibb, 532.)

Thus, diligence in delivering the execution to the officer is of the highest importance. In the exercise of the federal jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, the obligation to pursue with the utmost diligence the delivery of the execution is more important; for between conflicting jurisdictions, the officer who first levies has the right to retain the property.

Peters 4.

Due diligence, then, enjoins a speedy delivery of the process to the officer, and that the lien shall be preserved by keeping the execution in the hands of the officer until a return of the property.

By the statutes of Virginia and Kentucky, one execution can be sued after another, if the first be not returned and executed. The great object of this law is that the plaintiff may maintain a continued and unbroken lien upon the debtor's property.

The laws of Virginia and Kentucky upon these points are the same, and the practice in the Circuit Court of the United States has been to mould their executions so as to embrace lands as well as goods and chattels; and this is shown by the decisions of this court in Wyman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 1; The Bank of the United States v. Halstead, 10 Wheat., 57. The question is, therefore, disentangled of any difficulties in the forms of the execution.

To apply these principles to the facts of the case, and first, as to the note for three thousand nine hundred dollars.

In the executions against Miller the plaintiffs were guilty of gross negligence.

The first execution is tested the 29th of December, 1822, and there was a delay of twenty-one days between the test and the delivery; [*376] and during this delay, other creditors might have come in, and the debtor might have aliened his property. This execution was levied on specified property, without any return that there was no other; and a subsequent execution was levied on other property than that, which was sold for one thousand three hundred dollars. Had the execution been issued earlier, the officer might have sold before the return day.

Although the feri facias was returnable the first Monday in March, the renditioni to compel the officer to sell was delayed until the 3d of April, 1822. When that was delivered does not appear.

That renditioni exponas was returned "not sold for want of bidders, and sale postponed by agreement," indorsed on execution No. 2130; but when that was returned does not appear.

The next renditioni exponas to compel the sale was not issued until the 17th of June, 1822, and the property was sold on the 1st and 2d of July.

From the time of this sale (2d July) the plaintiff delayed to put another feri facias into the officer's hands until the 1st day of October: ninety days were suffered to elapse without any effort.

Had the plaintiff been vigilant, he would immediately after the sales in July have issued another feri facias to bind the debtor's property.

That there was other property appears by the execution and sale on this second feri facias, and also by the levy on the third feri facias.

These delays were so great, there was such a want of vigilance and due superintendence; such was the careless manner in which the executions were suffered to limp and halt and drag, by intervals, between the one execution and another, that it has taken from the 29th of December, 1821, to the 16th of March, 1824, a period of twenty-six months and upwards, before the capias ad satisfaciendum issued.

During these twenty-six months there were three levies and three sales, and the process upon which these three levies and sales were compelled, were at intervals which evince a total inattention on the part of the plaintiffs.

377*] *His own testimony shows that he relied on the clerk and the marshal.

Neither clerk or marshal have, by law, authority to issue executions unless ordered.

They are not, virtute officii, bound to act as agents of the plaintiff in ordering and delivering executions. If they do so, it must be by special authority given by the plaintiff beforehand, or by adopting their acts afterwards. If the plaintiff has chosen to rely on the clerk and the marshal to do that for him which it was his duty to do, he must abide the loss by such delays as have been suffered. The clerk is to issue execution, when ordered, and of the kind directed—whether feri facias or capias ad satisfaciendum or elegit or levari facias—the marshal is bound to receive such when offered to him. It is the business of the plaintiff to direct the clerk to issue, and it is the business of the plaintiff to deliver to the marshal the execution when issued. It is no excuse for the delays which have happened for the plaintiff to say, it was the clerk's habit to issue executions and put them into a window in his office, and it was the habit of the marshal to call and get them. A reliance upon such habits shows the want of that superintendence and vigilance which was due from an assignee who expects recourse against the assignor.

It is no excuse for the lapse of time between the return day of one execution and the teste of the ensuing execution to say that the marshal did not return the execution at the return day. He was bound to return the execution according to the command of the precept, and was subject to a fine and penalty for failing to return the precept at the day appointed.

At each rule day on which the process was returnable, the plaintiff had a right to call for it, to demand it; to proceed against the officer for a failure to return the precept according to its mandate. Moreover, whether returned or not, he had the right by law on the rule day, and even before, to sue out any other execution and deliver it, so as to preserve his lien. The officer, upon such second execution, would, of 378] *course, regulate his conduct by what he had done on the previous execution.

So much for the delay between judgment and capias ad satisfaciendum on the note of three thousand nine hundred dollars by Miller to Gray, who assigned to Tyler, who assigned to the bank.

The two notes, and the process upon them, cannot be brought to the aid of each other. The parties are different, and each must be pursued independently. (2 Marsh., 523, 198, 199.) Upon the principles already stated and supported by authorities, the proceedings against the maker of the note for three thousand eight hundred dollars are liable to charges of the most gross and entire negligence.

The feri facias issued on the 29th of December, 1821, and did not come to the hands of the marshal until the 19th of January, 1822—nearly one month after its issue. From the return day (the first Monday in March) until the 3d of April, 1822, there was no movement, when a venditioni exponas issued, returnable in June; and then there was no sale; but this was postponed by agreement. The next venditioni was issued on the 17th of June, and sales were made on the 1st and 2d of July; and from that time the process was suffered to sleep until the 28th of December, 1822—a period of one hundred and seventy days. Even between the return day in September and the teste of the next execution in December, there was an interval of one hundred and eleven days.

2. The defendant having failed to proceed against the jailer for the escape, cannot have recourse to the assignor.

The cases before cited are adjudicated upon the principle that not only the direct remedy by suit, but the incidental remedies and securities given by law, and arising in the course of the suit, must all be resorted to. The remedy must be pushed in all its ramifications. (Owings v. Grimes, 5 Litt., 331; Parker v. Owings, 3 Marsh., 60; M'Ginnis v. Burton, 3 Bibb, 7; Campbell v. Hopson, 1 Marsh., 230.)

That the jailer and his sureties are liable for an escape cannot be denied. The discharge was altogether unlawful; the jailer should have resisted, or have refused to obey *the [379 order to discharge the drawer. (Cited, Hubbard v. Newhouse, 1 Bibb, 555.)

The law of Kentucky gives the use of the prisons of the State to the United States, and declares it to be the duty of the jailer to receive persons committed under the authority of the United States, and to keep them until discharged according to law (2 Dig., 679); and the jailer gives bond with sureties.

The statute of Kentucky abolishing imprisonment for debt does not operate upon the process of the courts of the United States. The justices had no color for the jurisdiction they assumed.

The plaintiffs have a remedy for the escape, and no person but the plaintiffs can pursue it. It is a remedy incidental to the action against the drawer, and they should have employed it before they instituted this suit.

The case of The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger has no analogy to this. There the complaint against the plaintiff was that he had been too swift.

Mr. Sergeant, in reply, said it was admitted that the suits had been regularly brought, and in good time; and the only question upon this point was whether the subsequent proceedings were also in time. He contended that they were, upon the authority of adjudged cases in Kentucky, and it is not necessary to go further than the judicial decisions of that State had gone. As to the obligation to pursue the officer for an escape, the claim is ungracious, after charging the plaintiff with the length of his pursuit.

No decision was ever yet made upon which the position assumed rests. If there is no decision, there is no such obligation. The law of the case is out of judicial proceedings. No law exists, unless found in these decisions. But it has been decided that the holder of a note is not bound to pursue extraordinary remedies. This is an extraordinary remedy.

And why should it be required? The officer

380*] is guilty of *no injury, for the insolvency of the drawer of the note is manifest. It cannot be doubted.

Mr. Justice BALDWIN delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the plaintiffs sue, not as the indorsers of two notes negotiable under the statute of Anne, which has never been adopted in Kentucky, but as assignees for a valuable consideration of promissory notes, which are assignable by the laws of that State, and on which the assignee may sue in his own name. (1 Kentucky Digest, 99.)

The first note was drawn by Anderson Miller, dated at Louisville, May 2, 1821, for three thousand nine hundred dollars, in favor of John T. Gray, negotiable and payable sixty days after date at the office of discount and deposit of The Bank of the United States, Louisville, Kentucky, for value received. The note was assigned in the following manner: "For value received, I assign the within note to Levi Tyler or order, John T. Gray, by Levi Tyler, his attorney." "For value received, I assign the within to the president, directors and company of The Bank of the United States, Levi Tyler."

As this note was drawn, assigned, and payable in Kentucky, the obligations and rights of the parties must depend on the laws of that State.

The statute authorizing the assignment of notes is silent as to the duties of the assignee or the nature of the contract created by the assignment. It only declares such assignment valid, and the assignee capable of suing in his own name, but the courts of that State have clearly defined the rights, duties, and obligation resulting from the assignment.

The assignee cannot maintain an action on the mere nonpayment of the note and notice thereof, or of a protest to the assignor, until the holder of the note has made use of all due and legal diligence to recover the money from the drawer. But if this fails, then the assignor may be resorted to on his assignment; which is held to be an engagement to pay the amount of the note if, after due and diligent pursuit, the maker is insolvent. This contract results from the act of assignment without any express 381*] agreement to be answerable; *the law is the same, whether this contract is expressed in terms, or is implied from the assignment; the rights and duties of the parties are the same in both cases. (4 Bibb, 286; 1 Marsh., 229.) This case may, then, be considered as an assignment of a promissory note, with an express promise by the assignor to pay if by legal process and due diligence the assignee is unable to recover the amount due from the drawer. Viewed in this light the case is more readily comprehended.

The means which the assignee is bound to use, the time within which he must commence, and the diligence with which he must pursue his legal remedies against the maker, and the extent to which he must carry them, have been the subject of much litigation and discussion in the courts of Kentucky; they have, however, adopted the following as principles, which must be taken to be the law of the State:

That the assignee is not bound to run a race against time, or to use extraordinary means; Peters 4.

that he is not required to prosecute a drawer or obligor further than a man of ordinary prudence and diligence would do in a case were he was solely and exclusively interested. But in order to bring himself within these rules, he must commence a suit against the drawer at the first term after the note becomes due, if a judgment could be obtained then. He must sue within such time before the term as will authorize him to procure judgment. After suit is brought he must prosecute it to judgment without delay or giving time to the maker of the note. Though he is notoriously insolvent, and dies on the third day of the first term after the note becomes due, and no administration is taken out on his estate, the assignor is discharged, if no suit has been brought. After judgment, there must be the same diligence in purchasing the debtor's property by execution as in the commencement of the suit. There must be no delay in putting the execution into the hands of the sheriff, or in making sale of the property levied on; he must continue the process of execution until the property of the drawer is exhausted, and the sheriff returns nulla bona to the last execution; and after his insolvency is thus ascertained, a capias ad satisfaciendum must be taken for his body; *and if he [382 is committed, the assignee must show what has become of the debtor, and how he has been discharged.

If the debtor assigns property, it must be sold. If property is taken in execution and replevin bond given, the bond must be put in suit; if there is bail to the action, and the principal cannot be taken on a capias ad satisfaciendum, the bail must be pursued, and all incidental and collateral remedies which may accrue to the assignee must be adopted and prosecuted; and the discharge of the drawer by the Insolvent Act at the suit of a third person will be no excuse for any relaxation in the diligence required to fix the assignor, who is suable only after the exhaustion of all legal means of obtaining payment.

The cases on this subject have been collected in a note in 2 Peters, 338, 339, 340; and were all cited and ably commented on by the counsel on both sides.

It is believed that the principles which exact such an unusual degree of vigilance from the assignee are peculiar to the jurisprudence of Kentucky, but they have been established by a long series of cases adjudged in their highest courts for many years; they have long formed the law of that State as to notes and bonds assigned under their statute, and the Legislature has not thought proper to change it. The courts in Virginia have given a very different construction to their statute on the same subject, and there are no decisions in any State which have extended the rule of diligence so far. But this court has always felt itself bound to respect local laws, however peculiar, in all cases where they do not come in collision with laws of higher authority and more imposing obligation. Such a case is not presented in the record now under our consideration.

These are the duties imposed by the law of Kentucky on the assignees of promissory notes before they can commence a suit against the assignor on his promise. These rules are the law of this case, and although in our opinion they carry the doctrine of diligence to an extent unknown to the principles of the common law or the law of other States where bonds, notes, and bills are assignable, we must adopt them as the guide of our judgment. They must 383]* be considered with *a reference to the laws of Kentucky respecting judgments and executions, in order to form a correct opinion of their true character. A judgment does not bind land in that State; the lien attaches only from the delivery of an execution to the sheriff; it then binds real and personal property, held by a legal title. An execution returned is no lieu on any property not levied on, and no new one can be acquired until a new execution is put into the hands of the sheriff; and none can issue while a former levy is in force. (6 Kentucky Digest, 485, sec. 8.) Any delay, then, by the assignee enables the debtor to acquire, hold or alienate his property in the interval between judgment and the execution reaching the sheriff; as well as between the return of one and the lien acquired by a new execution. There is, therefore, more reason in exacting strict diligence on the part of the assignee, than in those States where real estate is bound by a judgment without an execution. On general principles, it is certainly a rule of very great rigor to require a capias ad satisfaciendum to be issued and served after a return of nulla bona. But as, by the law of Kentucky, no equitable interest in real or personal property (except where it is held or covered by mortgage, deed of trust, or other incumbrance) can be taken in execution, a capias ad satisfaciendum is the only mode by which the equitable estate of the debtor or his choses in action can be in any way reached by any legal process. (1 Ken. Dig., 504, sec. 5, 505, sec. 6.) It may be the means of coercing the payment of the debt, and it must, therefore, be used. The return of nulla bona to an execution, is, in that State, evidence only of there being no property of the debtor on which a levy can be made. It is not evidence of there being no equitable interests, which are beyond the reach of legal process, or of his not having that kind of property on which no levy can be made. A debtor, confined by an execution from the federal courts, can only be discharged under the Insolvent Act of Congress, passed January, 1800, the provisions of which are effectual to compel a disclosure of all his property. In the language of this court, "the coercive means of this law are to be found in the searching oath to be administered, and in the fear of a pros- 384]* ecution *for perjury and recommitment in the same action. (The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, 2 Peters, 352.)

The creditor has a right to use these coercive means, and where he intends to make the insolvency of the debtor the ground of a resort to the assignor of the note on which the judgment was obtained, he is by the principles of the Kentucky decisions bound to use them to the full extent authorized by the laws of that State as expounded by its highest judicial tribunals.

In discarding from our minds all considerations unconnected with the peculiar local law which governs this case, and considering it in all its bearings on both parties, we are not prepared to say that either has any right to complain of the severity of the rules which impose on them their respective obligations. If the law merchant were to govern, the plaintiff would be without remedy.

Suing as the indorser of a negotiable note, he must fail for want of protest or demand of payment of the drawer, and notice to the indorser. The diligence exacted of him is quite as extreme, if not more so, as when he sues as assignee. He must not give the drawer time for one day beyond the days of grace, or what local usage permits. His notorious insolvency, his being discharged as an insolvent debtor or a certified bankrupt, will not excuse the holder. This court have decided at this term, in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Magruder, that where a drawer of a note dies before it becomes due, and the indorser administers on his estate, demand of payment and notice to the indorser are indispensable. No decisions in Kentucky on assigned notes establish a more rigid doctrine than is applicable to indorsers by the law merchant. In such cases demand and notice are required to fix the indorser, because the debtor may pay by the interference of friends; not because he is supposed to have the means of doing it otherwise. It is too late to inquire into the reason of these rules, which have become settled and established as the general law of negotiable notes in the commercial world, and of assignable notes in Kentucky. They must be submitted to as the law of the contract into which *the parties respectively [385 enter, on becoming indorsers in the one case, and assignees in the other. If it is not going beyond the principles of the common law of England and this country, it is at least extending them to their utmost limits, to say that the assignor of a note, without fraud, or a promise to pay in the event of the insolvency of the drawer, should be liable by the mere effect of the assignment; and that there is no difference between his assigning with or without an express promise. It is at least testing the contract of assignment by the rules of the summum jus. Neither the statute of Anne or of any of the States of this Union making notes assignable (so far as is known) expressly impose on the assignor any obligation which did not attach to the assignment of a chose in action at common law. Such assignments are recognized; and though the assignee cannot sue in his own name, his rights are as much protected in courts of law as those of assignees, by virtue of the statute. (3 Bibb, 293; 4 Bibb, 557.) It is not easy to assign any sound reasons for construing the assignment as, per se, importing a higher obligation in the one case than the other. But the law of Kentucky has given this effect to assignments of notes under the statute of that State, and as the plaintiffs cannot sustain this action in their own name without the aid of the law, they must submit to the conditions which the settled judgments on the action have imposed on them. If, in availing themselves of this strict obligation imposed on the assignor they find themselves compelled to use a corresponding degree of vigilance on their part exceeding that which is required in other States under similar statutes, this court cannot afford them an exemption from its exercise. The local law is clearly settled, and we must submit to it, however we might be inclined to construe the law, if it were now open to a construction more consistent with that which has been uniformly given to statutes authorizing the assignment of bonds, bills and notes.

In the application of these rules to the first note which is the subject of this action, the defendant admits that up to the time of issuing the first execution there has been no want of due diligence on the part of the plaintiff; but he alleges that from that time there was unnecessary delay in various particulars, which have been pointed out and dwelt upon with much earnestness. As the statement of the case contains the teste, the return day, the day of the return of each execution, and the time of their coming to the hands of the marshal, it is unnecessary to examine in detail the alleged instances of negligence by the lapse of time: but there is one rule for which the defendant contends, which deserves some more particular notice.

By the fifth section of a law of Kentucky passed in 1811, it is made the duty of the courts of that State to appoint by rule of court some day in each month as a general return day of execution. The provisions of this law having been carried into effect, the defendant insists that in the exercise of the legal diligence incumbent on the plaintiff, he was bound to take out his execution returnable on some rule day, and attend at the office to watch its progress and effect. We think this would be applying the doctrine of diligence with unreasonable strictness. We find no decision which warrants the extension of it to so extreme a point, and we are not disposed to go one step in advance of the principles heretofore adopted. The case of The Bank v. Weisiger is conclusive on this part of the defendant's case; it was there settled that a lapse of thirty-six days between the judgment and the delivery of the execution to the marshal did not amount to that want of diligence which exonerated the assignor of the note on which the judgment was obtained.

We have been furnished with no adjudged cases in Kentucky which fix any definite time within which an execution must be made returnable. On examining the executions which have issued on the judgment on the first note, they are all returnable within three months from their teste; and no period of three months has been suffered to elapse, within which an execution has not been in the hands of the marshal, unless when writs of venditioni exponas were out, and they appear to have issued in all instances within that period. The greatest time which has intervened between the issuing of an execution and placing it in the hands of the marshal appears to be thirty-one days, and from the return of one execution or venditioni until the issuing of another, thirty 387 days; and we are not aware that in any of these cases there is any decision that this would be a want of diligence in the assignor. In the absence of any such decision, and feeling at liberty to decide upon them as open questions, we are of opinion that the plaintiff, in the proceedings subsequent to the judgment, has at no time omitted to pursue the maker of this note with all the diligence which the law required of him. On this part of the case, we think the decision of this court in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Wei- siger is strongly applicable. This was a case of the assignee against the assignor of a promissory note. Judgment was entered November Term, 1821. Execution issued on the 29th of December; was placed in marshal's hands on the 19th of January, thirty-six days from the entry of judgment; returned nulla bona, at March Term, 1822, the 3d day of the month, and a capias ad satisfaciendum issued on the 11th of April, 1822, thirty-eight days from the return day of the fiery facias. This was held not to be such a want of diligence as exonerated the assignor. This decision seems to us to cover all the ground assumed by the plaintiff up to the time of the discharge of Miller from his imprisonment on the capias ad satisfaciendum; and thus far we think he has done or omitted no act which has impaired his right of action.

It remains now to consider the last allegation of the want of diligence imputed to the plaintiff, and its effect on the suit. Miller was arrested and imprisoned on the 27th of March, 1824, and on the same day was discharged by the jailer on the order of two justices of the peace, acting or pretending to act under a law of Kentucky, passed in 1820 (1 Ken. Dig., 503, secs. 1 and 3), abolishing imprisonment for debt, and authorizing a justice of the peace, on application of any person in jail or in prison bounds, on reasonable notice to the party at whose suit he has been committed, to issue an order for his discharge.

It is not necessary to inquire whether this law would apply to process from the federal courts so as to legalize the discharge of a prisoner from the execution issued in this case, and protect the jailer and his sureties from an action by the plaintiffs for an escape. The laws of Kentucky on this subject are too [*388] clear to admit of a doubt: they authorize the discharge of a debtor from imprisonment on making a schedule of his property, surrendering it to the use of his creditors, and taking the oath prescribed. (1 Ken. Dig., 490, 491, 492, Act of 1819; 564, Act of 1821.)

It was under this law that the justices acted in issuing the order of discharge. But it could not apply to a commitment by the marshal under an execution from the federal courts, because an express provision was made by prior laws which made it the duty of the jailer to safely keep such prisoners until they shall be discharged according to the laws of the United States. (2 Kentucky Digest, 676.) The Act of 1798 provides that jailers shall receive into their custody all persons committed under the authority of the United States, and keep them safely, until discharged by the due course of the laws of the United States; and the jailer is subject to the same pains and penalties for neglect of duty as if the commitment had been by State authority. By the Act of 1800, the marshal of the United States has a right to use any prison for the imprisonment of any one by legal process in the same manner as the sheriff of a county may, if the prisoner was delivered by him; and this law was unrepealed and in force at the time of Miller's discharge. To entitle a debtor to a discharge under the insolvent law of January, 1800, he must give the creditor thirty days' notice of his application, and take an oath that he is not worth thirty dollars, &c.

The jailer was bound to take notice of this law, and of the laws of Kentucky, which required him to detain the prisoner until he complied with these provisions: he knew the conditions of his bond, and acted at his peril in releasing him without one day's confinement, without notice, oath, or the order of the district judge. The discharge was wholly unauthorized and illegal; the order of the justices did not protect the jailer; and he was liable to the plaintiff in an action for the escape to the full amount of the execution.

The Act of 1812 (2 Ken. Dig., 679) requires all jailers to execute in their County court a bond, with one or more approved sureties, in at least the sum of one thousand dollars, *and as much more as the court may deem proper, payable to the commonwealth, and conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office of jailer, which may be put in suit by any person injured by his acts. And the Act of 1811 enacts that where a bond is given by any public officer to the commonwealth, the recovery against the principal and his sureties shall not be limited to the penalty, but they shall be liable according to law, and to the full extent of the official obligations of such officer, as the same are enumerated in the condition of such bond. (2 Ken. Dig., 978.)

The remedy thus afforded to the plaintiff was a substantial one; extending to his whole claim, if the jailer or his securities were solvent. It was not indirect, remote, or doubtful. He had acquired a new security, of which the assignor had a right to claim the benefit; but which he could not use for his protection: the plaintiff could alone sue for the escape, or bring an action on the jailer's official bond, which enured to his use, but not to the use of the defendant. If this new security had been a bond for the prison bounds, there would be no doubt that it would be his duty to pursue the parties to it before resorting to the defendant; and it was equally his duty to pursue the jailer and his securities on his bond of office.

The jailer had violated his duty; his bond became forfeited; he and his securities had put themselves in the place of the debtor who was permitted to escape, and they thus assumed all his responsibility to the plaintiff. No event could arise by which they could be discharged. A voluntary return or a recaption of the prisoner would not avail them; they were under a stronger and more direct obligation to pay the money than special bail; against whom, it is admitted, that legal proceedings must be used with due diligence before resorting to the assignor.

Although we find no express decision by the courts of Kentucky enjoining on a plaintiff the necessity of suing a jailer and his securities for the escape of a prisoner, yet it seems to us that, in the spirit of them all, he is bound to do so. The general principle of all the cases is that a plaintiff must pursue, with legal diligence, all his means and *remedies, direct, incidental or collateral, to recover the amount of his debt from the defendant or anyone who has put himself, or has by operation of law been put in his place. This the plaintiffs in this case have wholly omitted, with a plain, undoubted cause of action against the jailer and his sureties; with legal means of compelling them to pay to the whole extent of their estates, and, for aught which appears, to the full amount of his claim against Miller, the maker of the note in question. They have made no attempt to assert their rights against either. According to the spirit and principle of the Kentucky decisions, we are constrained to say this is not due diligence; but that kind of legal negligence which entitled the defendant to a judgment in his favor in the Circuit Court.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of the proceedings on the second note, which were conducted with less diligence than those on the first.

Having thus disposed of the first error assigned by the plaintiff, it remains to consider the second, which is that the Circuit Court erred in rejecting the evidence offered of Miller's notorious insolvency at the time the note became due.

If the court are correct in overruling the exception taken to the charge of the Circuit Court, we cannot reverse their judgment for overruling this evidence. It did not conduce to prove any fact material to the issue between the parties, which was not whether Miller was in fact insolvent, but whether the plaintiff had by due diligence ascertained his insolvency by legal process commenced in time, diligently conducted till its final consummation, and by the exhaustion of all incidental and collateral remedies afforded by the law, without obtaining the debt. The proof, or the admission of actual insolvency, would in no wise relieve the plaintiffs from the duty imposed on them; it would not accelerate their right to sue the defendant or enlarge his obligation to pay, which did not arise by the mere insolvency of the maker of the note, but by its legal ascertainment in the manner prescribed by the judicial law of Kentucky. That law has been recognized by this court in the case of Weisiger, as applicable *to cases of this description. [*391] To decide now that the plaintiffs could avail themselves of the insolvency of the maker, unaccompanied with the diligent use of all legal remedies, and in a case where we are of opinion that the plaintiffs have not made use of the diligence which under the circumstances of this case it was incumbent on them to use, would be to disregard all the principles of Kentucky jurisprudence, as evidenced by the received opinion, general practice, and judicial decisions of that State.

We think it is not an open question whether these principles shall be respected by this court, and cannot feel authorized to depart from them in a case to which their application cannot be questioned.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed with costs.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Seventh Circuit and District of Kentucky, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed with costs.

392*] *OLIVER SAUNDERS, Plaintiff in Error,
v.
BENJAMIN GOULD.

Practice—Rhode Island law of descent—case of Gardner v. Collins.

Where the whole cause, and not a point or points in the cause, has been adjourned from the Circuit Court to this court, the case will be remanded to the Circuit Court.

The case was admitted to be essentially the same with that of Gardner v. Collins (2 Peters, 58), but the counsel for the plaintiff relied on evidence adduced to show a settled judicial construction of the act of the Legislature of Rhode Island relative to descents, different from that which had been made in this court. "The court is not convinced that the construction of the act which prevails in Rhode Island is opposed to that which was made by this court."

THIS case came before the court on a certificate of a division of opinion by the judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

It was submitted, without argument, by Mr. Coxe for the plaintiff in error, and Mr. Whipple for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL stated:

When this case was brought before the court, it was admitted by the counsel to be essentially the same with Gardner v. Collins, reported in 2 Peters's Rep., 58; but he relied on certain evidences which he exhibited of a settled judicial construction of the act on which the cause depended, different from that which had been made by this court. Had the court been satisfied on this point, that settled construction would undoubtedly have been respected. But the court was not convinced that the construction which prevails in Rhode Island is opposed to that which was made by this court. On communicating this decision to the bar, counsel declined arguing the cause; and a certificate, similar to that which was given in the former case, was about to be prepared: but on inspecting the record, it was perceived that the judges of the Circuit Court, instead of dividing on one or more points, had divided on the whole cause; and had directed the whole case to be certified to this court. Considering this as irregular, the court directs the cause to be remanded to the Circuit Court, that further proceedings may be had therein according to law.

393*] *SARAH SPRATT, Administratrix of JAMES SPRATT, Appellant,
v.
THOMAS SPRATT, Appellee.

Naturalization—act of court of record regarding same—Maryland act as to alien heirs.

The second section of the Act of Congress "to establish a uniform system of naturalization," passed in 1802, requires that every person desirous of being naturalized shall make report of himself to the clerk of the District Court of the district where he shall arrive, or some other court of record in the United States, which report is to be recorded, and a certificate of the same given to such alien; and "which certificate shall be exhibited to the court by every alien who may arrive in the United States after the passing of the act, on his application to be naturalized as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States." James Spratt arrived in the United States after the passing of this act, and was under the obligation to report himself according to its provisions. The law does not require that the report shall have been made five years before the application for naturalization. The third condition of the first section of the law, which declares that the court admitting an alien to become a citizen "shall be satisfied that he has resided five years in the United States," &c., does not prescribe the evidence which shall be satisfactory. The report is required by the law to be exhibited on the application for naturalization, as evidence of the time of arrival in the United States. The law does not say the report shall be the sole evidence; nor does it require that the alien shall report himself within any limited time after arrival. Five years may intervene between the time of the arrival and the report, and yet the report be valid. The report is undoubtedly conclusive evidence of the arrival, but it is not made by the law the only evidence of that fact. [406]

James Spratt was admitted a citizen of the United States by the Circuit Court for the County of Washington in the District of Columbia, and obtained a certificate of the same in the usual form. The act of the court admitting James Spratt as a citizen was a judgment of the Circuit Court, and this court cannot look behind it and inquire on what testimony it was pronounced. [406]

The various acts on the subject of naturalization submit the decision upon the right of aliens to courts of record. They are to receive testimony, to compare it with the law, and to judge on both law and fact. If their judgment is entered on record, in legal form, it closes all inquiry; and, like any other judgment, is complete evidence of its own validity. [408]

The Act of the Legislature of Maryland of 1791, which authorizes the descent to alien heirs of lands held by aliens under "deed or will" in that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the State of Maryland, does not authorize the descent to such heirs of land in that part of the district which was purchased by an alien at a sale made under an order of the Court of Chancery, and for which no deed was executed before the purchaser became a citizen of the United States, or before his decease. [408]

THIS case came before the court from the Circuit Court for the County of Washington in the District of Columbia, on a case stated in that court.

*The plaintiff, Thomas Spratt, instituted in the Circuit Court an action of replevin, the defendant, as the administratrix of James Spratt, having levied a distress on the property of the plaintiff for rent claimed to be due for a house occupied by him in the city of Washington, and to which he claimed title in himself, and in the brothers and sisters of James Spratt, deceased. It was agreed by the counsel that the title to the house and lot of ground upon which the same is erected, should be determined upon the following stated facts:

Thomas Spratt, Andrew Spratt, Sarah Spratt and Catharine Spratt, are brothers and sisters of the whole blood of James Spratt, the intestate, and are natives of Ireland, and subjects of the King of Great Britain, and were not, before the institution of this suit, naturalized as citizens of the United States; and but one of them, Thomas Spratt, and the deceased, James Spratt, ever came to the United States. James Spratt was also a native of Ireland, and came to the United States some time before the 18th of June, 1812; from which time he continued to reside in the United States until March, 1824, when he died without issue, leaving Sarah Spratt, his widow, who became the administratrix to his estate.

James Spratt, on the 17th of May, 1817, appeared in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the County of Washington, and before the court made the declaration on oath required by the first condition of the first section of the act to establish an uniform system of naturalization, &c., passed the 14th of April, 1802; which proceeding was recorded in the minutes of the court's proceedings, and a certificate thereof, under the hand of the clerk and seal of the court, on the same day given to James Spratt; he having, on the 14th of April then next preceding, made report of himself to the Clerk of the Circuit Court, as stated in the certificate; which report was recorded in the office of the said clerk, and the certificate of such report and registry, and of the declaration on oath, having been granted by the clerk to him. On the 11th of October, 1821, James Spratt made application to the said Circuit Court to be admitted a citizen of the United States; and was, on the same day, admitted by 395] the court to become a citizen of the United States, as appears by the record of the proceedings of the court, upon the matter of the said application: a certificate whereof, under the hand of the clerk, and the seal of the court, was afterwards given by the clerk to him, and is part of the case.

Sarah Spratt was also a native of Ireland, and a native-born subject of the King of England; she emigrated to the United States before James Spratt, and has continually, from the time of her emigration, resided in the United States; and before his naturalization was lawfully married to him, and lived with him as his lawful wife from their marriage till his death in March, 1824, and was his wife at and before the time of his said naturalization; but has not been naturalized as a citizen of the United States pursuant to the Act of Congress, unless so naturalized by the naturalization of her husband.

On the 9th of June, 1825, the plaintiff and his brothers and sisters, claiming as heirs-at-law of James Spratt, brought their action of ejectment in this court against Sarah Spratt to recover possession of sundry of the lands and tenements whereof James Spratt died seized in fee, not including the messuage and tenement in this suit: in which suit (the same having been duly prosecuted and put to issue) such proceedings were had, that the title of Thomas Spratt was duly submitted to the consideration and judgment of the court, upon a case agreed and stated between the parties, to be taken and considered as a special verdict; upon which the court gave judgment for Sarah Spratt; whereupon a writ of error was sued out to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment was re-examined, as appears in 1 Peters, 343, which is part of the case.

In the matter of a suit in the Circuit Court of the County of Washington, by one of the creditors of Simon Meade, deceased, Joseph Forrest was appointed to make sale of certain real estate of Simon Meade, and after having set up the same for public sale, to return the sale to the court for confirmation; and having 396] on the 21st day of May, 1821, set up the estate on terms specified, by which the purchase money was to be paid in four installments, at six, twelve, eighteen, and twenty-four months, and that a conveyance of the property should be made to the purchaser on the ratification of the sale by the court. The house and lot in question in this case were purchased by James Spratt, and on the 21st October, 1821, the trustee returned the sale to the court. On the 24th of December, 1822, an interlocutory order was made for the ratification of the report of the sale; and in January, 1824, a final ratification of the sale was passed by the court.

James Spratt, after his naturalization, and not before, paid the purchase money for the property by the installments, with interest; but no deed of conveyance of the same was ever executed to him, and he died invested with no other title to the premises in controversy but what he acquired by the sale at auction, the written memorandum, report and ratification thereof, and the payment of the purchase money.

In the statement of the case thus agreed, there was inserted the following memorandum, which was signed by the counsel for the parties in the cause:

"It is understood, however, that the plaintiff does not admit, but denies, that the proceeding and evidence touching the naturalization of James Spratt, or any part of the same, do purport to be or to show a due and legal naturalization of James Spratt as a citizen of the United States; and maintains that the manner and process of such pretended naturalization appears from such proceedings and evidence to have been irregular and void, unless such proceedings and evidence, or any part of the same, be held by the court to be conclusive in this case that he was duly and legally naturalized as such citizen: while the defendant and avowant, on the other hand, maintains that no defect or irregularity appears in the manner and process of such naturalization; that the manner and process of the same in its preliminary stages are not examinable in this case, but that the admission of James Spratt to become a citizen of the United States, as it appears in the record and certificate thereof, is, either substantively or in connection with the other evidence *thereof, conclusive of his due [397 naturalization as such citizen: all which matters are understood and agreed to be involved in the question of title, and to be accordingly reserved for the consideration and judgment of the court upon the premises."

The declaration for naturalization made by James Spratt was in the following terms:

"James Spratt, a native of Ireland, aged about twenty-six years, bearing allegiance to the King of Great Britain and Ireland, who emigrated from Ireland, and arrived in the United States on the 1st of June, 1812, and intends to reside within the jurisdiction and under the government of the United States, makes report of himself for naturalization according to the acts of Congress in that case made and provided, the 14th of April, Anno Domini 1817, in the clerk's office of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Washington: and on the 14th of May, 1817, the said James Spratt personally appeared in open court, and declared on oath that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince," &c.

W. BRENT, Clerk.

The record of the proceedings of the Circuit Court on the naturalization of James Spratt is in the following terms:

"At a Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, begun, and held in and for the County of Washington, at the city of Washington, on the first Monday of October, being the 1st day of the same month, in the year of our Lord 1821, and of the independence of the United States the forty-sixth.

"James Spratt, a native of Ireland, aged about thirty years, having heretofore, to wit, on the 14th of May, 1817, declared on oath in open court that it was bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly to the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"And it now appearing to the satisfaction 398] of the court by *the testimony of two witnesses, citizens of the United States, to wit, Samuel N. Smallwood, and Jonathan Pront, that the said James Spratt hath resided within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States for five years at least last past, and within the County of Washington one year at least last past, and that during the whole of that time he hath behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same—the said James Spratt is thereupon admitted a citizen of the United States; having taken the oath 'that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever; and particularly to the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to whom he was before a subject.' 11th of October, 1821."

A certificate in due form, corresponding with this record, was given to James Spratt.

For the appellant, it was contended,

1. That the admission of said James Spratt to citizenship, as stated in the record, was legal.

2. That whether regular or not, it is conclusive as the judgment of a court upon a subject within its jurisdiction.

3. That whether so or not, the parties are concluded by the admission in the former case stated.

4. That no deed or conveyance having ever passed to James Spratt in his life, the appellees could not inherit under the act of Maryland.

5. That if the Maryland law would entitle the appellees to inherit any estate but one executed by an actual conveyance, and the time when he acquired a right to the estate should be thought material, then it will be contended that he acquired such a right, not at the time of bidding, but either on his paying the purchase money, or on the ratification of the sale; both which events occurred after his naturalization.

Peters 4.

Mr. Key and Mr. Jones*, for the ap- 399pellant, argued that the naturalization of Thomas Spratt had been regular, according to the requirements of the act of Congress.

The law does not make the report made by the alien, and the register of his arrival, the only evidence of the period and fact of his arrival in the United States. (Acts of Congress, 22d of March, 1816; July 30th, 1813). The court are to be satisfied of the facts, and are not excluded from receiving other evidence than the register. While it is admitted that this is the best evidence, it does not follow that it is the only evidence which can be received. The court are authorized to act on such evidence as will enable them to decide on the application for naturalization. One objection which is made is, that the place of the residence of Thomas Spratt is not stated in the proceedings. To this it is answered that such proceedings are not to be examined critically. It would be dangerous to the property of numbers if exceptions of this character were encouraged. But no part of the law makes the place of the residence of the alien material, except that he shall have resided for one year preceding the application in the State where he shall apply to be naturalized.

The act of admission to citizenship by a court authorized to admit to naturalization, is of itself sufficient evidence of citizenship, without looking behind it. It is a judicial act of a court of competent jurisdiction, and upon which it has adjudicated. If, in the proceedings of the court, in a matter necessarily judicial in which testimony has been adduced upon which it has passed a judgment, and of which a record has been made by the proper officers, there has been anything erroneous, the court should itself correct it; but until this is done, it is binding on all the world. (Cited, 7 Co., 420; 2 Peters, 157; 5 Cranch, 174.) But a fair and full examination of the different provisions of the laws relative to naturalization, will show that the proceedings of the Circuit Court were entirely correct and legal.

The property in controversy, although purchased by Thomas Spratt before his naturalization, was not held by deed; no conveyance having been made to him of the same, even up to the time of his death.

*The right of a foreigner thus to take 400lands, depends on the particular words of the statute; and the case must be one within its provisions or it will not operate. The terms of it are in reference to lands within that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded to the United States, held by aliens "under deed or will, hereafter to be made." Thus the provisions are limited to lands acquired or held by one of this description of titles.

The bid of Thomas Spratt acquired for him an equitable interest in the property, and he became a trustee, not for his foreign heirs, but for his wife, who, by his subsequent naturalization, became a citizen. The law did not intend that such an interest should go to his foreign heirs.

There is good reason why the law of Maryland should confine the mode of taking to an actual, executed, legal title. Equitable interests in land are sources of infinite confusion. In Maryland, in 1793, they were not subject to execution for debt, and have been made so in 1810. Thus, a foreigner, under the construction claimed, would take an equitable title to land, having all the benefits of it, and it would not be subject to the claims of his creditors.

As to the liability to execution of equitable interests in lands, cited, 3 Johns. C. R., 316; 1 Caines' Cases, 46; 1 Murph. Rep., 383; 18 Johns., 94; 4 Har. and M'Hen., 533; 5 Johns., 335; 4 Johns., 41; 7 Johns., 206.

By the bid for the property no absolute title was acquired. The whole proceedings of the trustee were subject to examination by the court, and required its confirmation. Thus, by the case, until 1824, when the sale was finally ratified, the title of the purchaser was not complete, and the deed, then to be executed according to the decree, would not relate back to the time of the sale.

Mr. Core, for the defendant.

Whether James Spratt was actually naturalized depends upon a proper construction of the Act of April 14th, 1802.

It is contended that the certificate is essentially defective under the provisions of this law.

401* § 1. It does not ascertain the place of his intended settlement.

2. It was not made five years anterior to the 11th of October, 1821. The act requires every person being an alien, who may arrive in the United States subsequent to its passage, to report such his arrival.

This certificate is to be exhibited by such alien on his application to be naturalized, as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States. It is not required that the certificate should set forth the period of his arrival; but the meaning of the act is, that the date of such certificate shall be considered as that of the arrival.

The Act of 1790 contained no provision for a previous declaration of an intention to become a citizen. All that was to be done, was to be done at the time of naturalization. The Act of 1795 required such a declaration; it was to be made three years before he could be naturalized, and must set forth a residence of five years.

The Act of 1798 required this declaration to be made five years before the admission, and that he should make an averment of fourteen years' residence before his application. The Act of 1802 is applicable to those who were then within the United States, and had taken the preliminary steps. This act has been much considered here, as well as elsewhere. In this district, after solemn argument, the point has been ruled in accordance with the present judgment of the court. The Circuit Court of Pennsylvania gave the same construction to the law. (1 Peters's C. C. R., 457.)

As to the argument that the record is conclusive as to the right: It may be urged that several of the acts of Congress expressly negative this; if the prerequisites of the statute are not complied with, the certificate is a nullity.

There is great danger in considering these certificates as conclusive, from the number of courts who are authorized under the law to issue them. If those who are to issue them may omit any one of these requisites, they may omit all. Persons who have never been in the United States may obtain them. Persons may procure them immediately on their arrival here.

*This is not a judicial act, but one [402 purely ministerial. (3 T. R., 126; Toller, 128.)

The powers to admit to the rights of citizenship have been uniformly vested in and exercised by State courts under the authority of Congress. But Congress cannot vest any part of the judicial power of the United States in State Tribunals. (1 Wheat, 304, 330; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 5 Wheat., 27.)

There are no parties. All is ex-parte. No one can remove the proceedings by writ of error, certiorari, or in any other manner. No one can oppose the act of granting the evidence of naturalization. If ministerial, the proceedings must, on the face of them, show that they were correct. If the exercise of a judicial power, still it must appear that the court had jurisdiction, not only over the subject matter, but over the party, in the circumstances in which he stood.

This doctrine is fully laid down in Rose v. Himely (4 Cranch, 268), and the case of Griffith v. Frazier 8 Cranch, 1, 22, 8; Walker v. Turner, 9 Wheat., 541; cited, also, 1 Paine, 55).

The next objection is that the plaintiff cannot recover, because this is a mere equitable estate.

It cannot be questioned but that as well by the common law as by the general statutes of descent of Maryland, equitable estates descend precisely as do legal.

Is this equitable estate embraced within the sixth section of the Act of Maryland of December 19, 1791? (Burch's Dig., 221.) It provides "that any foreigner may, by deed or will, hereafter to be made, take and hold lands," &c. The law recognizes two modes of acquiring lands—descent and purchase. In general, the only modes of acquiring lands by purchase, are by deed or will. When an agreement of purchase is made, the party is considered in equity as the owner, because he is in equity entitled to a deed. Whether the deed be, or be not in fact executed, it is by and through the deed that the estate is his. A deed actually executed under one law passes no title unless recorded within the time stipulated; but it confers upon the grantee a right to come into chancery to have it recorded, which, when obtained, relates *back, as between the parties, to [403 the date of the agreement (Md. Laws, 1766, c. 14, sec. 2; 1785, c. 72, sec. 12.)

In equity, James Spratt was entitled to a deed from the moment the sale was made, provided it was ratified. Equity will consider that as done which ought to have been done. (Sugd., 40, 353; 13 Ves., 517; 2 Cox, 231.)

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

This case depends entirely on the title of the defendant in error to the premises in the avowry mentioned, who is one of the brothers and heirs of James Spratt, deceased.

James Spratt was a native of Ireland, who arrived in the United States previous to the 18th of June, 1812, and resided therein until his death. On the 14th of April in the year 1817, he made report of himself to the clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, in the County of Washington, which report was recorded; and, on the 17th of May thereafter, he appeared in the same court and made the declaration on oath required by the first condition of the first section of the act "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," &c., passed the 14th of April, 1802; which proceeding was recorded, and a certificate thereof granted in the following words:

"District of Columbia, to wit: James Spratt, a native of Ireland, aged about twenty-six years, bearing allegiance to the King of Great Britain and Ireland, who emigrated from Ireland and arrived in the United States on the 1st of June, 1812, and intends to reside within the jurisdiction and under the government of the United States, makes report of himself for naturalization according to the Acts of Congress in that case made and provided, the 14th of April, Anno Domini 1817, in the clerk's office of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the County of Washington: and on the 14th of May, 1817, the said James Spratt personally appeared in open court, and declared on oath that it is his intention to become a citizen of 404*] the United States, and to *renounce all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince," &c.

This certificate was given under the hand and seal of the clerk. On the 11th of October, 1821, James Spratt again appeared in open court, and took the oath required by law, and was admitted as a citizen. The certificate of his admission states that the three first conditions required by the Act of the 14th of April, 1802, had been complied with.

The said James Spratt intermarried with the plaintiff in error, Sarah Spratt, and departed this life in March, 1824, without issue, and intestate. The plaintiff in replevin is a native-born subject of the King of Great Britain and Ireland, and was not naturalized at the time of the institution of this suit.

In the year 1791 the State of Maryland passed an Act entitled "An Act concerning the territory of Columbia and the city of Washington;" the sixth section of which provides, "that any foreigner may, by deed or will, to be hereafter made, take and hold lands within that part of the said territory which lies within this State, in the same manner as if he was a citizen of this State; and the same lands may be conveyed by him, and transmitted to, and be inherited by his heirs or relations, as if he and they were citizens of this State."

This act continues in force.

A decree was made by the Circuit Court for the sale of the estate of Simon Meade, deceased, to satisfy his creditors, on certain conditions therein specified. In pursuance of this decree, Joseph Forrest, who was appointed to carry the same into execution, did, on the 21st of May, 1821, offer the real estate of the said Simon Meade for sale on the terms and conditions following, to wit: that the purchase money should be paid in four equal installments, at six, twelve eighteen, and twenty-four months, respectively, from the day of sale, with interest; and that a conveyance of the property in fee simple should be made to the purchaser upon the ratification of the sale by the court, and the payment of all the said installments of the purchase money, with interest. At this sale the said *James Spratt became the purchaser of the lot in the avowry mentioned. On the 15th of October, 1821, the said Joseph Forrest made his report to the court, and on the 24th of December, 1822, an interlocutory decree was made for confirming the sale; and on the 26th of January, 1824, the final decree of confirmation was passed. No deed was executed during the lifetime of the said James Spratt. The bidding at the sale was made while the said James Spratt was an alien, but before any other step was taken he became a citizen. Upon this state of facts the Circuit Court gave judgment for the plaintiff in replevin; which judgment has been brought before this court by writ of error. The cause has been argued very elaborately by counsel. It appears to the court to depend essentially on two questions:

1. Was James Spratt a citizen of the United States?

2. If he became a citizen, did the premises in the avowry mentioned pass to his alien relations who are his next of kin?

The first question depends on the Act of 1802 for establishing a uniform rule of naturalization. The act declares that an alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States "on the following conditions, and not otherwise." The act then prescribes four conditions, the three first of which were applicable to James Spratt, and were literally observed.

The 2d section enacts "that in addition to the directions aforesaid, all free white persons, being aliens, who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this act, shall, in order to become citizens of the United States, make registry and obtain certificates in the following manner, to wit: every person desirous of being naturalized, shall, if of the age of twenty-one years, make report of himself, &c." The law then directs what the contents of the report shall be; orders it to be recorded, and that a certificate thereof shall be granted to the person making the report: "which certificate shall be exhibited to the court by every alien who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this act, on his *application to [*406 be naturalized, as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States.

As James Spratt arrived within the United States after the passage of the Act of 1802, he is embraced by the second section of that act, and was under the necessity of reporting himself to the clerk, as that section requires. Must this report be made five years before he can be admitted as a citizen?

The law does not in terms require it. The third condition of the first section provides "that the court admitting such aliens shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years at least," but does not prescribe the testimony which shall be satisfactory. This section was in force when James Spratt was admitted to become a citizen, and was applicable to his case. But the second section requires, in addition, that he shall report himself in the manner prescribed by that section; and requires that such report shall be exhibited, "on his application to be naturalized, as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States." The law does not say that this report shall be the sole evidence, nor does it require that the alien shall report himself within any limited time after his arrival. Five years may intervene between his arrival and report, and yet the report will be valid. The report is undoubtedly conclusive evidence of the arrival, and must be so received by the court; but if the law intended to make it the only admissible evidence, and to exclude the proof which had been held sufficient, that intention ought to have been expressed. Yet the inference is very strong from the language of the act, that the time of the arrival must be proved by this report; and that a court, about to admit an alien to the rights of citizenship, ought to require its production.

But is it anything more than evidence which ought, indeed, to be required to satisfy the judgment of the court, but the want of which cannot annul that judgment? The judgment has been rendered in a form which is unexceptionable. Can we look behind it, and inquire on what testimony it was pronounced?

407* The act does not require that the report shall be mentioned in the judgment of the court, or shall form a part of the certificate of citizenship. The judgment and certificate are valid, though they do not allude to it. This furnishes reason for the opinion that the act directed this report as evidence for the court; but did not mean that the act of admitting the alien to become a citizen should be subject to revision at all times afterwards, and to be declared a nullity, if the report of arrival should not have been made five years previous to such admission.

The Act of 1816, sec. 6, has, we think, considerable influence on this question. That act requires that the certificates of report and registry required as evidence of the time of arrival in the United States and of the declaration of intention to become a citizen, "shall be exhibited by every alien, on his application to be admitted a citizen of the United States, who shall have arrived within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States since the 18th day of June, 1812; and shall each be recited at full length in the record of the court admitting such alien; and any pretended admission of an alien, who shall have arrived within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States since the said 18th day of June, 1812, to be a citizen, and after the promulgation of this act, without such recital of each certificate at full length, shall be of no validity."

James Spratt arrived within the United States previous to the 18th day of June, 1812, and is, consequently, not within the provisions of the Act of 1816.

This act is not intended to explain the Act of 1802, but to add to its provisions. It prescribes that which the previous law did not require; and prescribes it for those aliens only who arrive within the United States after the 18th day of June, 1812. It annuls the certificates of citizenship which may be granted to such aliens, without the requisite recitals; consequently, without this act, such certificates would have been valid. The law did not require the insertion of these recitals in the certificate of James Spratt.

The various acts upon the subject submit the decision on the right of aliens to admission as citizens to courts of record. They [408 are to receive testimony, to compare it with the law, and to judge on both law and fact. This judgment is entered on record as the judgment of the court. It seems to us, if it be in legal form, to close all inquiry; and, like every other judgment, to be complete evidence of its own validity.

The inconvenience which might arise from this principle, has been pressed upon the court. But the inconvenience might be still greater if the opposite opinion be established. It might be productive of great mischief, if, after the acquisition of property on the faith of his certificate, an individual might be exposed to the disabilities of an alien, on account of an error in the court not apparent on the record of his admission. We are all of opinion that James Spratt became a citizen of the United States on the 11th of October, 1821.

2. Did the property mentioned in the avowry descend to his alien relations?

Since aliens are incapable of taking by descent, the answer to this question depends on the Enabling Act of the State of Maryland in the year 1791. That act does not enable aliens who may come into the District of Columbia to transmit all real estate, however acquired, to their alien relations by descent; but such lands only as shall be thereafter acquired by deed or will. This is a qualification of the power which cannot be disregarded. The words are not senseless, and would not, we must suppose, have been inserted had they not been intended to operate. They limit the capacity of an alien to inherit from his alien ancestor residing within this district to lands which he had taken by deed or will. It is not for us to weigh the reasons which induced the Legislature to impose this limitation. It is enough for a court of justice to know that the Legislature has imposed it, and that it forms part of the law of the case.

If any equivalent act might be substituted for a deed, no such equivalent act can be found in this case. The auction at which this property was sold certainly took place while James Spratt was an alien; but that the sale was entirely conditional, and the purchase depended on the payment of the installments, on the confirmation of the court, and the final decree of the court. Before the first installment became due, before even the report was returned to the court, James Spratt became a citizen. He did not, therefore, while an alien, hold this land by a deed or by any title equivalent to a deed.

In a controversy between the alien heirs of James Spratt and Sarah Spratt (1 Peters, 343) this court determined that land which James Spratt took and held under the Enabling Act of Maryland descended to his alien heirs, but, that land which he took and held as a citizen did not pass to those heirs.

The lot mentioned in the avowry comes, we think, within the last description; and did not descend to the plaintiff in replevin.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the avowant.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, holden in and for the County of Washington, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that this cause be, and the same is hereby remanded to the said Circuit Court with instructions to enter judgment in the said court for the avowant in said cause.

v.

THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

Missouri act for the establishment of loan-offices—bills of credit—defense to assumpsit on promissory note that U. S. Constitution prohibits the act forming the consideration.

On the 27th day of June, 1821, the Legislature of the State of Missouri passed an Act, entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices;" by the third section of which the officers of the treasury of the State, under the direction of the governor, were required to issue certificates to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars of denominations not exceeding ten dollars nor less than fifty cents, in the following form: "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury of any of the loan-offices in the State of Missouri in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of ——— dollars, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date." These certificates were to be receivable at the treasury, and by tax-gatherers and other public officers in payment of taxes or moneys due or to become due to the State, or to any town or county therein, and by all officers, civil and military, in the State in discharge of salaries and fees of office; and in payment for salt made at the salt springs owned by the State, and to be afterwards leased by the authority of the Legislature. The twenty-third section of the act pledges certain property of the State for the redemption of these certificates, and the law authorizes the governor to negotiate a loan of silver or gold for the same purpose. A provision is made in the law for the gradual withdrawal of the certificates from circulation, and all the certificates have since been redeemed. The commissioners of the loan-offices were authorized to make loans of the certificates to the citizens of the State, assigning to each district a proportion of the amount of the certificates to be secured by mortgage or personal security; the loans to bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and the loans on personal property to be for less than two hundred dollars. Held, that the certificates issued under the authority of the law of Missouri were "bills of credit," and that their omission was prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall "emit bills of credit."

A promissory note given for certificates issued at the loan-office of Chariton, in Missouri, payable to the State of Missouri, under the Act of the Legislature "establishing loan-offices," is void.

The action was assumpsit on a promissory note, and the record stated "that neither party having required a jury, the cause was submitted to the court, and the court having seen and heard the evidence, the court found that the defendants did assume as the plaintiff had declared, that the consideration for the note and the assumpsit was for loan-office certificates loaned by the State of Missouri at her loan-office in Chariton, which certificates were issued under "an Act for establishing loan-offices, &c." Held, that it could not be doubted that the declaration is on a note given in pursuance of the Act of Missouri; and that under the plea of non assumpsit, the defendants were at liberty to question the validity of the consideration which was the foundation of the contract, and the constitutionality of the law in which it originated. The record thus exhibiting the case gives jurisdiction to this court over the case on a writ of error prose. [*411 cited by the defendants to this court from the Supreme Court of Missouri, under the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

Everything which disaffirms the contract, everything which shows it to be void, may be given in evidence on the general issue in an action of assumpsit. [426]

In its enlarged and perhaps literal sense, the term "bill of credit" may comprehend any instrument by which a State engages to pay money at a future day, thus including a certificate given for money borrowed. But the language of the Constitution itself, and the mischief to be prevented, equally limit the interpretation of the terms. The word "emit" is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received, or for money borrowed for present use. Nor are instruments executed for such purposes, in common language, denominated "bills of credit." "To emit bills of credit," conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the NOTE. "Bills of Credit," what are within the Constitution.

No State shall emit bills of credit. Const. of U. S., Art. 1, Sec. 10, 1.

The term "bills of credit," in its mercantile sense, comprehends a great variety of evidences of debt, which circulate in a commercial country.

To constitute a bill of credit within the Constitution, it must be issued by a State, involve the faith of the State, and be designed to circulate as money, on the credit of the State, in the ordinary uses of business. Notes issued and payable in gold and silver by a bank, created by a law of the State, having capital for payment of its notes, containing no promise by the State, are not bills of credit within the Constitution. Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth of Ky., 11 Pet., 257; Darrington v. State Bank of Alabama, 13 How., 12.

To "emit bills of credit" means to issue paper intended to circulate through the community, for its ordinary purposes, as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. Contracts by which a State bind itself to pay money at a future day for services performed, or for money borrowed for present use, are not "bills of credit" within the inhibition of the Constitution. Craig v. State of Missouri, supra; followed in Byrne v. State of Missouri, 8 Pet., 40.

Certificates issued by the auditor and treasurer of a State, receivable at the treasury or loan-office Peters 4.

of the State, for taxes or debts due the State, and other public payments, for the redemption of which a fund was constituted, and for which the faith of the State was pledged, are "bills of credit" within the meaning of the Constitution. Idem: idem.

Bills made and issued by a bank, incorporated by a State, managed by directors, having a capital stock paid in and liable for its debts, and subject to be sued for nonpayment, are not "bills of credit" issued by a State, though the State owns the entire stock; the Legislature elects the directors, the faith of the State is pledged for their redemption, and they are receivable for public dues. Darrington v. State Bank of Alabama, 13 How., 12.

A State may grant acts of incorporation for the attainment of those objects which are essential to the interest of the society. This power is incident to sovereignty, and there is no limitation on its exercise by the States, in the Constitution, in respect to the incorporation of banks. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257.

The Constitution of the United States does not forbid States or counties from borrowing money and giving proper securities therefor; and such securities are not bills or credit within the meaning of the Constitution. McCoy v. Washington County, 3 Phila., 290.

"Confederate treasury notes" were not "bills of credit;" but they were, nevertheless illegal, because issued in aid of rebellion. Bailey v. Milner, 1 Abb., U. S., 261.

community for its ordinary purposes as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. This is the sense in which the terms have always been understood. [431]

The Constitution considers the emission of bills of credit and the enactment of tender laws as distinct operations, independent of each other, which may be separately performed. Both are forbidden. To sustain the one because it is not also the other; to say that bills of credit may be emitted if they be not made a tender in payment of debts, is, in effect, to expunge that distinct independent prohibition, and to read the clause as if it had been entirely omitted. [434]

It has been long settled that a promise made in consideration of an act which is forbidden by the law is void. It will not be questioned that an act forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law, is against law. [436]

WRIT of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

In 1823 an action of trespass on the case was instituted in the Circuit Court for the County of Chariton, in the State of Missouri, by the State of Missouri, against Hiram Craig and others. The declaration sets forth the cause of action in the following terms:

"For, that whereas, heretofore, on the 1st day of August, in the year of our Lord 1822, at the County of Chariton aforesaid, the said Craig, John Moore, and Ephraim Moore, made their certain promissory note in writing, bearing date the day and year aforesaid, and now to the court here shown, and thereby, and then and there, for value received, jointly, and severally, promised to pay to the State of Missouri on the 1st day of November, 1822, at the loan-office in Chariton, the sum of one hundred and ninety-nine dollars 412] and ninety-nine cents, and the two per centum per annum, the interest accruing on the certificates borrowed, from the 1st day of October, 1821. Nevertheless, the said Hiram Craig, John Moore, and Ephraim Moore, did not on the 1st day of November, or at any time before or since, pay to the State of Missouri, at the loan-office in Chariton, the said sum of one hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-nine cents, or the two per centum per annum, the interest accruing on the certificates borrowed, from the 1st day of October, 1821, but the same to pay, &c."

To this declaration the defendants pleaded the general issue; and neither party requiring a trial by jury, the case was submitted to the court on the evidence and the arguments of counsel. The record contained the following entry of the proceedings of the court:

"And afterwards, at a court began and held at Chariton, on Monday, the 1st day of November, 1824, and on the second day of said court, in open court, the parties came into court by their attorneys, and neither party requiring a jury, the cause is submitted to the court; therefore, all and singular the matter and things and evidences being seen and heard by the court, it is found by them that the said defendants did assume upon themselves, in manner and form as the plaintiffs, by their counsel, allege: and the court also find that the consideration for which the writing declared upon and the assumpsit was made, was for the loan of loan-office certificates loaned by the State at her loan office at Chariton; which certificates were issued and the loan made in the manner pointed out by an Act of the Legislature of the said State of Missouri, approved the 27th day of June, 1821, entitled, 'An Act for the establishment of loan offices, and the acts amendatory and supplementary thereto.' And the court do further find that the plaintiff hath sustained damages by reason of the nonperformance of the assumptions and undertakings of them, the said defendants, to the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and seventy-nine cents. Therefore, it is considered, &c."

The defendants in the Circuit Court of the County of Chariton appealed, in 1825, to the Supreme Court of the State of *Mis- [413 souri, the highest tribunal in that State, where the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed.

The defendants prosecuted this writ of error under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

The Act of the Legislature of Missouri under which the certificates were issued which formed the consideration of the note declared upon, was passed on the 27th of June, 1821. It is entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices, &c." The provisions of the third, thirteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, twenty-third and twenty-fourth sections of the act are all that have a connection with the questions in the case which were before the court.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the auditor of public accounts and treasurer, under the direction of the governor, shall, and they are hereby required to issue certificates signed by the said auditor and treasurer to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, of denominations not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents (to bear such devices as they may deem the most safe) in the following form, to wit: This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury or any of the loan-offices of the State of Missouri in the discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of $—, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date, the — day of —, 182 .

"Sec. 13. Be it further enacted, That the certificates of the said loan-office shall be receivable at the treasury of the State and by all tax-gatherers and other public officers in payment of taxes or other moneys now due or to become due to the State or any county or town therein; and the said certificates shall also be received by all officers civil and military in the State, in discharge of salaries and fees of office.

"Sec. 15. Be it further enacted, That the commissioners of the said loan-offices shall have power to make loans of the said certificates to citizens of this State residing within their respective districts only, and in each district a proportion shall be loaned to the citizens of each county therein, according to the number thereof, secured by mortgage or personal security: Provided, That the sum loaned on mortgage shall *never exceed one half [414 the real unincumbered value of the estate so mortgaged: Provided, also, That no loans shall ever be made for a longer period than one year, nor at a greater interest than at the rate of six per cent. per annum, which interest shall be always payable in advance, nor shall a loan in any case be renewed unless the interest on such re-loan be also paid in advance: Provided, also, That the commissioners aforesaid shall never make a call for the payment of an installment at a greater rate than ten per centum for every six months; and that whenever any installment to a greater amount than at the rate of ten per centum per annum be required, at least sixty days' previous notice shall be given to the person or persons thus required to pay: And provided, also, That all and every person failing to make payment shall be deprived in future of credit in such office, and be liable to suit immediately for the whole amount by him or them due.

"Sec. 16. Be it further enacted, That the said commissioners of each of the said offices are further authorized to make loans on personal securities by them deemed good and sufficient for sums less than two hundred dollars, which securities shall be jointly and severally bound for the payment of the amount so loaned, with interest thereon, under the regulations contained in the preceding section of this act."

"Sec. 23. Be it further enacted, That the general assembly shall, as soon as may be, cause the salt springs and lands attached thereto given by Congress to this State to be leased out, and it shall always be the fundamental condition in such leases that the lessee or lessees shall receive the certificates hereby required to be issued, in payment for salt, at a price not exceeding that which may be prescribed by law; and all the proceeds of the said salt springs, the interests accruing to the State, and all estates purchased by officers of the several offices under the provisions of this act, and all the debts now due or hereafter to be due to this State, are hereby pledged and constituted a fund for the redemption of the certificates hereby required to be issued; and the faith of the State is hereby also pledged for the same purpose.

"Sec. 24. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the auditor and treasurer to withdraw annually from circulation 415 one-tenth part of the certificates which are hereby required to be issued, &c."

The case was argued by Mr. Sheffey for the plaintiffs in error, and by Mr. Benton for the State of Missouri.

Mr. Sheffey, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the record shows a proper case for the jurisdiction of this court, within the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

2. That the Act of the Legislature of Missouri, entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices," is unconstitutional and void; being repugnant to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall emit bills of credit.

3. That the State of Missouri has no right to recover on the promissory note which is the foundation of this suit, because the consideration was illegal.

He argued that this case comes fully within the purpose, spirit, and letter of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789. The purpose of that section was to place within the revising, controlling, and correcting power of the Supreme Court of the United States, any violations of the Constitution of the United States or of treaties by State legislation. The harmony of the government, its equal operation, the preservation of its fundamental principles, the peace of the nation, rest securely upon the execution of this power of the Supreme Court. While this power would be cautiously used, it would be fearlessly asserted and employed when it was required of the court and enjoined on the judges. The government of the United States was one for the whole of "the people of the United States." It was formed for "the people;" and its solemn and impressive preamble contains the declaration that "we, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union," "do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States."

To keep the Constitution perfect, and preserve it as a government for "the whole people" the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary law of 1789 was enacted. This law *brought into exercise the constitu- 416 tional powers of the court, but it created no new powers.

In the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat., 304, 330), this court have said, "the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1799, is supported by the letter and spirit of the Constitution." And in the same case (p. 324) they say, "the Constitution of the United States was ordained and established," not by the United States in their sovereign capacities, but, as the preamble declares, "by the people of the United States."

That a tribunal should exist before which questions of a constitutional character may be brought, is not denied by anyone, and the Constitution itself has provided that which now entertains such questions. It has given to this court the powers which they exercise—great, extensive, superior and responsible as they are—that this court may stand forth as the guardians of the rights of the people claimed and declared in the Constitution, and that those rights may be protected from encroachment and destruction. To this court "the people" look for this protection; and when the invader of their rights is a sovereign State, they have not the less confidence and assurance that the principles of the government will be preserved. This court know no parties to the cases which come before them for decision. It is the principles which are to govern their decisions in those cases to which the court look, and they leave to those from whom their powers are derived—to "the people of the United States"—to decide, not upon their rightful and constitutional exercise of those powers, for to the Constitution they are answerable only for their exercise, but whether they shall continue so to use them. The whole people of the United States have given these powers, and they only, by a majority, and not a portion of them less than this constitutional whole, can nullify those powers or interrupt the exercise of any which are regularly applied under the Constitution. The Constitution must be changed by the whole people before the exercise of this power of revision can cease.

This court have never been willing to employ its powers of inquiring into the constitutionality of laws but where the *obligation was 417 imperative, and the case was one clearly within their duties. In the case of Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 128), the court declared, "the question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution, is a question which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in a doubtful case. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other."

To present the question in the case now before the court no plea was necessary; the defense arises under the general issue.

The record shows that this was a case in the courts of the State of Missouri in which the constitutionality of a law of that State was brought into question. The cause of action is stated to be promissory notes given for certificates issued under the Act of the Legislature of Missouri establishing loan-offices, and the validity of these certificates must have been the whole subject of inquiry in the State courts. Their validity depended solely on the harmony of that act with the federal compact, and the courts of Missouri could only have affirmed their validity by affirming the act under which they were issued to be constitutional and valid, or, in other terms, not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

This is not a new question. It has been frequently presented to this court, and has been uniformly decided according to the views of the plaintiffs in error. (Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 355; Miller v. Nicholls, 4 Wheat., 311; Williams v. Norris, 12 Wheat., 117.) In Wilson v. The Black Bird Creek Marsh Company (2 Peters, 251), the court say: "It is sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of the Judicial Act if the record shows that the Constitution or a law or a treaty has been misconstrued, or the decision could not be made."

2. The certificates issued by the State of Missouri under the law are "bills of credit," and thus the law conflicts with the Constitution of the United States. They are issued under the authority of the State, and put into circulation by the State as the representative of 418] money: as a substitute *for it; to perform the functions of money, by becoming the medium of circulation.

The prohibition of the Constitution is in these terms, and every word in the clause is important and emphatic: "No State shall" "coin money," "emit bills of credit," "make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

What is the form and meaning of these bills? They purport to be receivable at the treasury, or any loan office of the State, in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State. They are issued of different denominations, from two hundred dollars to fifty cents, payable to no particular person; they are, by the twenty-third section of the law, to be received for salt by the lessees of the property of the State; by the officers of the State in discharge of their salaries and fees of office. They pass, by delivery, with every characteristic of money. It is only necessary to state these, the purposes of their issue, the character and form of the certificates; the obligation imposed on the citizens of Missouri to receive them; to establish that they are "bills of credit," "emitted" "by the State" of Missouri, or "coined" money: and that, not being "gold or silver," they are "a tender in payment of debts."

The sufferings of the people of the United States from the issues of paper money, or "bills of credit," during the Revolution, were yet in full operation when the Constitution was formed. While it might be dangerous to deny that many of the means of the war were procured by the emission of that money, the exigencies of the country, struggling for existence, were the only safe apology for their use. When the confederated States were about to become a nation which should owe its prosperity to sound and just and equal principles, the opportunity to reproduce the same state of things—the same wide and wasteful ruin by the acts of any of the members of the confederacy—was at once decisively and explicitly prohibited by those who formed the Constitution. But, if it is contended that the certificates issued by the State of Missouri were not "bills of credit," because it is said they are not declared by the act which directs their emission to be "a legal tender," it is asserted *that if even they are not [419 such, it is not essential to "a bill of credit" that it shall have that incident. (The Federalist, No. 44.) Many of the bills issued by the States during the war were not made a legal tender; but they circulated widely, and with equally disastrous consequences. (9 Va. Stat. at large, 67, 147, 223, 480, &c.)

In relation to money as a circulating medium, the States are one. All and each have one and the same interest in a sound currency. These interests are a unit—not only from the neighborhood of the States to each other, the identity of their interests, and their free and unrestrained intercourse, but because the regulations of the Constitution embrace the whole subject of money as a circulating medium.

To the existence of the government (certainly to its convenient fiscal operations) a uniform currency is important, if not essential; and if the principles which may be fairly drawn from a sound construction of the provision in the Constitution under examination extend to bring into doubt the legality of bank notes circulated as money under the charters granted to banks by State laws, these principles may not be the less true or their importance of the less magnitude.

3. If the certificates for which promissory notes were given are void, and the act of the Legislature of Missouri on which they are founded was against the Constitution of the United States, the note upon which this action was brought in the Circuit Court of Missouri was without consideration, and void. The State cannot receive upon such notes.

Mr. Benton, for the defendant in error.

The State of Missouri has been "summoned" by a writ from this court under a "penalty," to be and appear before this court. In the language of the writ, she is "commanded" and "enjoined" to appear. Language of this kind does not seem proper when addressed to a sovereign State, nor are the terms fitting, even if the only purpose of the process was to obtain the appearance of the State. They impute "a fault" in the State; they imply an omission or neglect by the State. *The language [420 of "commanding and enjoining" would only be well employed if these had occurred.

The State of Missouri has done no act which was not within the full and ample powers she possesses as a free, sovereign, and independent State. She has passed a law which she considers in the proper and beneficial exercise of her legislative functions, and which had for its object the promotion of the interests of her citizens.

Mr. Benton said that he did not appear in this case for the State of Missouri as in ordinary cases depending in this court, not as the advocate of the State; for her acts did not require the efforts of an advocate to vindicate them; he appeared rather as a "corps of observation," to watch what was going on.

The State had passed a law authorizing the governor to employ counsel, and he had been called upon to represent the State. He had listened to what had been going on before the court, and he found a gentleman from another State imputing to Missouri an act fraught with injustice and immorality.

Such a course was not calculated to promote harmony and to secure a continuance of the Union. If, in questions of this kind, or if in any cases, the character of a sovereign State shall be made the subject of such imputation, this peaceful tribunal would not be enabled to procure the submission of the States to its jurisdiction; and contests about civil rights would be settled amid the din of arms, rather than in these halls of national justice.

The Act of the Legislature of Missouri "establishing loan-offices" had no purposes to accomplish by which injury could be sustained by anyone. The deticiency of currency in the State, and the expenses which attended its new organization, made the arrangements proposed and authorized by the act convenient and beneficial to the citizens of the State. The State, when it directed that the certificates should be issued, made sufficient and certain provision for their redemption and payment. The permanent continuance of the circulation of the certificates was prohibited by an effective regulation in the bill: the twenty-fourth section of 421 the law provided for the gradual extinction of the certificates as they should come in; and power was given to the governor, by the twenty-ninth section of the law, to negotiate a loan of gold and silver for their redemption. Thus, the certificates were issued upon ample means for their discharge, and their discharge to their full value must soon take place.

These certificates were not made a legal tender. They are not directed to pass as "money;" and while there is no obligation imposed by the law that they shall be taken by the citizens of the State, it declares that the State shall take them in payment for taxes, for salt, and for fees of office.

When examined, these certificates will be found to be nothing more than evidences of loans made to the State, and for the payment of which she has given specific and available pledges.

It will not be contended that the States have not power to borrow money; and what other form of certificate of a loan than that which was adopted by the State of Missouri can be devised, when this power is exercised. In every State of the Union loans have been negotiable, and certificates of the amount due by the State to the individual lenders are issued.

The certificates which were the consideration Peters 4.

of the note were, therefore, not "bills of credit," in the constitutional acceptation of such instruments.

An examination of the legislation of the States in which such bills were issued, and the proceedings under those laws, will clearly show that the condition of things in the view and recollection of the convention which formed the Constitution was different, in every essential feature, from that which was created by the law of Missouri. Massachusetts, in 1690, issued bills of credit to pay taxes and other debts due to the State treasury; but the soldiers, to whom they were offered, would not receive them. (1 Hutchinson's Hist., 402, 404.) In 1714 and 1716 other issues were made, and they were directed to pass as money, and made a tender. In 1749 the issuing of such bills was discontinued.

During the Revolution, the "bills of credit" which were issued by the authority of 422 the States and by that of Congress, were in most cases made a tender; and this was the objectionable feature in them. So long as no objection to receive them is imposed by the law which directs or authorizes their emission, they can injure no one. Free to refuse them, the citizen may protect himself from loss by their depreciation by rejecting them.

The bills issued under the Missouri law have not this vice. That part of the law which obliges the officers of the State to receive them for salaries and fees, is not before the court. The notes in this suit were given voluntarily; and thus, in reference to the case of the plaintiffs in error, it cannot be said that the certificate given for the note had the character of "a legal tender."

In reference to the duty imposed on the lessees of the salt springs owned by the State, it should be known to the court that when the "act for the establishment of loan offices" was passed no leases had been given for those salt springs. If it was to be made a condition of the lease (to which the lessee would consent) that these certificates should be received for salt, it cannot therefore be said that any obligation was imposed on him of which he could complain.

While, therefore, in every aspect of this case, those who consented to take these certificates could not be affected to their injury by their depreciation, they might be benefited by it; they could pay them to the State for taxes, for fees of office, and for salt at their nominal or par value.

An examination of the proceedings of the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States will show that the prohibition which is now supposed to operate on the law of Missouri was carried by a majority of one vote. (Journal of the Convention, 302.) It should not be presumed that this clause of the Constitution was intended to extend to such issues as those authorized by the act of Missouri. The language of the Constitution should be strictly construed, as it is a limitation on the sovereignty of a State.

All bank notes issued under State charters are equally within the constitutional prohibition, if the construction assumed by the counsel of the plaintiffs in error is correct. *The 423 "wolf scalp" certificate, by which the flocks and herds of the west are protected from the devastations of those destructive and numerous animals; the "crow certificates," the rewards of those who save the fields of the husbandman from the spoils of their worst enemies, are all receivable for taxes, and all are equally obnoxious to the exceptions taken to the certificates issued under the law of Missouri.

The consideration for the note which is the subject of this suit was a good and valuable consideration, and the note is binding on the parties to it by the express terms of the sixteenth section of the law. The note furnished the parties with the means of paying their taxes, and was a benefit to them. All the certificates have been redeemed by the State.

Congress is not authorized to issue bills of credit. The States may do all that is not prohibited, while Congress can do nothing which is not granted by the Constitution. Congress had no express authority to issue treasury notes, but they were issued. These notes were precisely like the Missouri certificates.

The treasury notes were not bills of credit; for they were not made, by the act under which they were issued, a legal tender. They were freely circulated throughout the United States without objections, and they were most useful instruments in the financial operations of the government during the last war.

This court has not jurisdiction of the case. It is not within the requirements of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act. The validity of the State law was not drawn in question before the courts of Missouri, and no decision was made in those courts upon the validity of the objection now set up under the Constitution of the United States.

The pleadings do not show that the law was drawn in question; they only deny the promise charged in the declaration. Upon the matters thus presented, and on no others, did the courts of Missouri decide.

Mr. Sheffey, in reply. The whole argument on the part of the State of Missouri in founded 424 on the assumption that "the certificates are not bills of credit, because they are not made a legal tender."

The provision of the Constitution was introduced to prevent a mischief; one of the most fatal effects on the property of the citizens of the United States; and thus considered, it is to be construed liberally. A strict construction, and particularly one which would render it inoperative, or feeble in its influence, would not be justifiable.

The evils are the same, and the notes will circulate as freely and as extensively whether they are made a tender or not. Whatever paper promise is circulated on the credit of the State is a bill of credit, and is within the sense of the Constitution.

This provision in the Constitution was introduced to prevent the States from resorting to State necessity as an apology for the issue of paper. The States are not allowed to "coin money," and the object clearly was to prevent anything being made by the States which would serve as a circulating medium.

The word "emit" is a peculiar expression. The States may borrow money and give notes, but that is not coining money, nor is it emitting bills of credit; and so "wolf and crow scalp certificates" are only evidence that the counties in the States which authorize them owe so much money for meritorious and beneficial services.

It is denied that the power of the United States to issue bills of credit is the same which has been claimed by the State of Missouri under this law. It does not follow that because the United States may issue such bills the states may do so. The States are specially prohibited such issues by the Constitution.

The proposition which was made in the convention to give to Congress the power to issue bills of credit may have been rejected because that power had been already given in the power to coin money, and regulate its value. Congress has this power, as an incident, like the power to issue debentures; which is exercised as an incident to the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL* deliver- [425 ed the opinion of the court, Justices THOMPSON, JOHNSON, and M'LEAN dissenting:

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered in the Court of Last Resort in the State of Missouri, affirming a judgment obtained by the State in one of its inferior courts against Hiram Craig and others on a promissory note.

The judgment is in these words: "And afterwards at a court," &c., "the parties came into court by their attorneys, and, neither party desiring a jury, the cause is submitted to the court; therefore, all and singular the matters and things being seen and heard by the court, it is found by them that the said defendants did assume upon themselves, in manner and form, as the plaintiff by her counsel alleged. And the court also find that the consideration for which the writing declared upon and the assumpsit was made was for the loan of loan-office certificates, loaned by the State at her loan-office at Chariton; which certificates were issued and the loan made in the manner pointed out by an Act of the Legislature of the said State of Missouri, approved the 27th day of June, 1821, entitled 'An Act for the establishment of loan-offices,' and the acts amendatory and supplementary thereto: and the court do further find that the plaintiff has sustained damages by reason of the nonperformance of the assumptions and undertakings of them, the said defendants, to the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and seventy-nine cents, and do assess her damages to that sum. Therefore, it is considered," &c.

The first inquiry is into the jurisdiction of the court.

The twenty-fifth section of the Judicial Act declares "that a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State, in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question" "the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity," "may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States."

To give jurisdiction to this court, it must appear in the record*, 1. That the valid- [426 ity of a statute of the State of Missouri was drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. 2. That the decision was in favor of its validity.

1. To determine whether the validity of a statute of the State was drawn in question, it will be proper to inspect the pleadings in the cause, as well as the judgment of the court.

The declaration is on a promissory note, dated on the 1st day of August, 1822, promising to pay to the State of Missouri on the 1st day of November, 1822, at the loan-office in Chariton, the sum of one hundred and ninety-nine dollars ninety-nine cents, and the two per cent. per annum, the interest accruing on the certificates borrowed from the 1st of October, 1821. This note is obviously given for certificates loaned under the Act "for the establishment of loan-offices." That act directs that loans on personal securities shall be made of sums less than two hundred dollars. This note is for one hundred and ninety-nine dollars ninety-nine cents. The act directs that the certificates issued by the State shall carry two per cent. interest from the date, which interest shall be calculated in the amount of the loan. The note promises to repay the sum, with the two per cent. interest accruing on the certificates borrowed, from the 1st day of October, 1821. It cannot be doubted that the declaration is on a note given in pursuance of the act which has been mentioned.

Neither can it be doubted that the plea of non assumpsit allowed the defendants to draw into question at the trial the validity of the consideration on which the note was given. Everything which disaffirms the contract, everything which shows it to be void, may be given in evidence on the general issue in an action of assumpsit. The defendants, therefore, were at liberty to question the validity of the consideration which was the foundation of the contract, and the constitutionality of the law in which it originated.

Have they done so?

Had the cause been tried before a jury, the regular course would have been to move the court to instruct the jury that the act of Assembly in pursuance of which the note was given was repugnant to the Constitution of the 427*] United States, *and to except to the charge of the judges if in favor of its validity: or a special verdict might have been found by the jury stating the act of Assembly, the execution of the note in payment of certificates loaned in pursuance of that act, and referring its validity to the court. The one course or the other would have shown that the validity of the act of Assembly was drawn into question on the ground of its repugnancy to the Constitution, and that the decision of the court was in favor of its validity. But the one course or the other would have required both a court and jury. Neither could be pursued where the office of the jury was performed by the court. In such a case, the obvious substitute for an instruction to the jury, or a special verdict, is a statement by the court of the points in controversy, on which its judgment is founded. This may not be the usual mode of proceeding, but it is an obvious mode; and if the court of the State has adopted it, this court cannot give up substance for form.

The arguments of counsel cannot be spread on the record. The points urged in argument Peters 4.

cannot appear. But the motives stated by the court on the record for its judgment, and which form a part of the judgment itself, must be considered as exhibiting the points to which those arguments were directed, and the judgment as showing the decision of the court upon those points. There was no jury to find the facts and refer the law to the court; but if the court, which was substituted for the jury, has found the facts on which its judgment was rendered, its finding must be equivalent to the finding of a jury. Has the court, then, substituting itself for a jury, placed facts upon the record which, connected with the pleadings, show that the act in pursuance of which this note was executed was drawn into question on the ground of its repugnancy to the Constitution?

After finding that the defendants did assume upon themselves, &c., the court proceeds to find "that the consideration for which the writing declared upon and the assumpsit was made was the loan of loan-office certificates loaned by the State at her loan-office at Chariton; which certificates were issued and the loan made in the manner pointed out *by an [*428 Act of the Legislature of the said State of Missouri, approved the 27th of June, 1821, entitled," &c.

Why did not the court stop immediately after the usual finding that the defendants assumed upon themselves? Why proceed to find that the note was given for loan-office certificates issued under the act contended to be unconstitutional, and loaned in pursuance of that act, if the matter thus found was irrelevant to the question they were to decide?

Suppose the statement made by the court to be contained in the verdict of a jury which concludes with referring to the court the validity of the note thus taken in pursuance of the act; would not such a verdict bring the constitutionality of the act as well as its construction directly before the court? We think it would: such a verdict would find that the consideration of the note was loan-office certificates issued and loaned in the manner prescribed by the act. What could be referred to the court by such a verdict but the obligation of the law? It finds that the certificates for which the note was given were issued in pursuance of the act, and that the contract was made in conformity with it. Admit the obligation of the act, and the verdict is for the plaintiff; deny its obligation, and the verdict is for the defendant. On what ground can its obligation be contested, but its repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States? No other is suggested. At any rate, it is open to that objection. If it be in truth repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, that repugnancy might have been urged in the State, and may consequently be urged in this court; since it is presented by the facts in the record, which were found by the court that tried the cause.

It is impossible to doubt that, in point of fact, the constitutionality of the act under which the certificates were issued that formed the consideration of this note, constituted the only real question made by the parties, and the only real question decided by the court. But the record is to be inspected with judicial eyes; and, as it does not state in express terms that this point was made, it has been contended that this court cannot assume the fact that it was made or determined in the tribunal of the State.

429*] *The record shows distinctly that this point existed, and that no other did exist; the special statement of facts made by the court as exhibiting the foundation of its judgment contains this point and no other. The record shows clearly that the cause did depend, and must depend, on this point alone. If, in such a case, the mere omission of the court of Missouri to say, in terms, that the act of the Legislature was constitutional, withdraws that point from the cause, or must close the judicial eyes of the appellate tribunal upon it, nothing can be more obvious than that the provisions of the Constitution and of an act of Congress may be always evaded; and may be often, as we think they would be in this case, unintentionally defeated.

But this question has frequently occurred, and has, we think, been frequently decided in this court. Smith v. The State of Maryland (6 Cranch, 286), Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat., 355), Miller v. Nicholls (4 Wheat., 311), Williams v. Norris (12 Wheat., 117), Wilson et al. v. The Black Bird Creek Marsh Company (2 Peters, 245), and Harris v. Dennie, in this term, are all, we think, expressly in point. There has been perfect uniformity in the construction given by this court to the twenty-fifth section of the Judicial Act. That construction is, that it is not necessary to state, in terms, on the record, that the Constitution or a treaty or law of the United States has been drawn in question, or the validity of a State law, on the ground of its repugnancy to the Constitution. It is sufficient if the record shows that the Constitution, or a treaty or law of the United States must have been construed, or that the constitutionality of a State law must have been questioned, and the decision has been in favor of the party claiming under such law.

We think, then, that the facts stated on the record presented the question of repugnancy between the Constitution of the United States and the act of Missouri to the court for its decision. If it was presented, we are to inquire,

2. Was the decision of the court in favor of its validity?

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff is a decision in favor of the validity of the contract, 430*] and, consequently, of *the validity of the law by the authority of which the contract was made.

The case is, we think, within the twenty-fifth section of the Judicial Act, and, consequently, within the jurisdiction of this court.

This brings us to the great question in the cause: Is the act of the Legislature of Missouri repugnant to the Constitution of the United States?

The counsel for the plaintiffs in error maintain that it is repugnant to the Constitution, because its object is the emission of bills of credit contrary to the express prohibition contained in the tenth section of the first article.

The Act under the authority of which the certificates loaned to the plaintiffs in error were issued was passed on the 26th of June, 1821, and is entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices." The provisions that are material to the present inquiry are comprehended in the third, thirteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth sections of the act, which are in these words:

Section the third enacts "that the auditor of public accounts and treasurer, under the direction of the governor, shall, and they are hereby required to issue certificates, signed by the said auditor and treasurer, to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, of denominations not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents (to bear such devices as they may deem the most safe), in the following form, to wit: "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury, or any of the loan-offices of the State of Missouri, in the discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of $—, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date, the— day of — 182 ."

The thirteenth section declares "that the certificates of the said loan-office shall be receivable at the treasury of the State, and by all tax-gatherers and other public officers, in payment of taxes or other moneys now due to the State or to any county or town therein, and the said certificates shall also be received by all officers, civil and military, in the State, in the discharge of salaries and fees of office."

The fifteenth section provides "that the commissioners *of the said loan-offices [431 shall have power to make loans of the said certificates to citizens of this State, residing within their respective districts only, and in each district a proportion shall be loaned to the citizens of each county therein, according to the number thereof," &c.

Section sixteenth. "That the said commissioners of each of the said offices are further authorized to make loans on personal securities by them deemed good and sufficient for sums less than two hundred dollars; which securities shall be jointly and severally bound for the payment of the amount so loaned, with interest thereon," &c.

Section twenty-third. "That the General Assembly shall, as soon as may be, cause the salt springs and lands attached thereto, given by Congress to this State, to be leased out, and it shall always be the fundamental condition in such leases that the lessee or lessees shall receive the certificates hereby required to be issued in payment for salt, at a price not exceeding that which may be prescribed by law; and all the proceeds of the said salt springs, the interest accruing to the State, and all estates purchased by officers of the said several offices under the provisions of this act, and all the debts now due or hereafter to be due to this State, are hereby pledged and constituted a fund for the redemption of the certificates hereby required to be issued, and the faith of the State is hereby also pledged for the same purpose."

Section twenty-fourth. "That it shall be the duty of the said auditor and treasurer to withdraw annually from circulation one-tenth part of the certificates which are hereby required to be issued," &c.

The clause in the Constitution which this act is supposed to violate is in these words: "No State shall "emit bills of credit."

What is a bill of credit? What did the Constitution mean to forbid?

In its enlarged, and perhaps its literal sense, the term "bill of credit" may comprehend any instrument by which a State engages to pay money at a future day; thus including a certificate given for money borrowed. But the language of the Constitution itself, and the mischief to be prevented, which we know from the history of our country, equally limit the interpretation of the terms. The word "emit" is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received, or for money borrowed for present use; nor are instruments executed for such purposes, in common language, denominated "bills of credit." To "emit bills of credit," conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes, as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. This is the sense in which the terms have been always understood.

At a very early period of our colonial history the attempt to supply the want of the precious metals by a paper medium was made to a considerable extent, and the bills emitted for this purpose have been frequently denominated bills of credit. During the war of our revolution we were driven to this expedient, and necessity compelled us to use it to a most fearful extent. The term has acquired an appropriate meaning; and "bills of credit" signify a paper medium, intended to circulate between individuals and between government and individuals, for the ordinary purposes of society. Such a medium has been always liable to considerable fluctuation. Its value is continually changing; and these changes, often great and sudden, expose individuals to immense loss, are the sources of ruinous speculations, and destroy all confidence between man and man. To cut up this mischief by the roots, a mischief which was felt through the United States, and which deeply affected the interest and prosperity of all, the people declared in their Constitution that no State should emit bills of credit. If the prohibition means anything, if the words are not empty sounds, it must comprehend the emission of any paper medium by a State government for the purpose of common circulation.

What is the character of the certificates issued by authority of the act under consideration? What office are they to perform? Certificates signed by the auditor and treasurer of the State are to be issued by those officers to 433 the *amount of two hundred thousand dollars, of denominations not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents. The paper purports on its face to be receivable at the treasury, or at any loan-office of the State of Missouri, in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State.

The law makes them receivable in discharge of all taxes or debts due to the State, or any county or town therein; and of all salaries and fees of office to all officers, civil and military, within the State, and for salt sold by the lessees of the public salt-works. It also pledges the faith and funds of the State for their redemption.

It seems impossible to doubt the intention of the Legislature in passing this act, or to mistake the character of these certificates, or the office they were to perform. The denominations of the bills—from ten dollars to fifty cents—fitted them for the purpose of ordinary circulation and their reception in payment of taxes, and debts to the government and to corporations, and of salaries and fees, would give them currency. They were to be put into circulation; that is, emitted, by the government. In addition to all these evidences of an intention to make these certificates the ordinary circulating medium of the country, the law speaks of them in this character, and directs the auditor and treasurer to withdraw annually one-tenth of them from circulation. Had they been termed "bills of credit," instead of "certificates," nothing would have been wanting to bring them within the prohibitory words of the Constitution.

And can this make any real difference? Is the proposition to be maintained that the Constitution meant to prohibit names and not things? That a very important act, big with great and ruinous mischief, which is expressly forbidden by words most appropriate for its description, may be performed by the substitution of a name? That the Constitution, in one of its most important provisions, may be openly evaded by giving a new name to an old thing? We cannot think so. We think the certificates emitted under the authority of this act are as entirely bills of credit as if they had been so denominated in the act itself.

But it is contended that though these certificates should be *deemed bills of credit, [434 according to the common acceptance of the term, they are not so in the sense of the Constitution, because they are not made a legal tender.

The Constitution itself furnishes no countenance to this distinction. The prohibition is general. It extends to all bills of credit, not to bills of a particular description. That tribunal must be bold indeed, which, without the aid of other explanatory words, could venture on this construction. It is the less admissible in this case, because the same clause of the Constitution contains a substantive prohibition to the enactment of tender laws. The Constitution, therefore, considers the emission of bills of credit and the enactment of tender laws as distinct operations, independent of each other, which may be separately performed. Both are forbidden. To sustain the one because it is not also the other; to say that bills of credit may be emitted if they be not made a tender in payment of debts, is, in effect, to expunge that distinct independent prohibition, and to read the clause as if it had been entirely omitted. We are not at liberty to do this.

The history of paper money has been referred to for the purpose of showing that its great mischief consists in being made a tender, and that, therefore, the general words of the Constitution may be restrained to a particular intent.

Was it even true that the evils of paper money resulted solely from the quality of its being made a tender, this court would not feel itself authorized to disregard the plain meaning of words, in search of a conjectural intent to which we are not conducted by the language of any part of the instrument. But we do not think that the history of our country proves either, that being made a tender in payment of debts is an essential quality of bills of credit, or the only mischief resulting from them. It may, indeed, be the most pernicious; but that will not authorize a court to convert a general into a particular prohibition.

We learn from Hutcheson's History of Massachusetts (Vol. I., p. 402), that bills of credit were emitted for the first time in that colony in 1690. An army returning unexpectedly from an expedition against Canada (which had proved as disastrous as the plan was magnificent) found the government ^{435*}totally unprepared to meet their claims. Bills of credit were resorted to for relief from this embarrassment. They do not appear to have been made a tender, but they were not on that account the less bills of credit, nor were they absolutely harmless. The emission, however, not being considerable, and the bills being soon redeemed, the experiment would have been productive of not much mischief had it not been followed by repeated emissions to a much larger amount. The subsequent history of Massachusetts abounds with proofs of the evils with which paper money is fraught, whether it be or be not a legal tender.

Paper money was also issued in other colonies, both in the north and south; and whether made a tender or not, was productive of evils in proportion to the quantity emitted. In the war which commenced in America in 1755, Virginia issued paper money at several successive sessions under the appellation of treasury notes. This was made a tender. Emissions were afterwards made in 1769, in 1771, and in 1773. These were not made a tender, but they circulated together; were equally bills of credit, and were productive of the same effects. In 1775 a considerable emission was made for the purposes of the war. The bills were declared to be current, but were not made a tender. In 1776, an additional emission was made, and the bills were declared to be a tender. The bills of 1775 and 1776 circulated together, were equally bills of credit, and were productive of the same consequences.

Congress emitted bills of credit to a large amount, and did not, perhaps could not, make them a legal tender. This power resided in the States. In May, 1777, the Legislature of Virginia passed an Act for the first time making the bills of credit issued under the authority of Congress a tender so far as to extinguish interest. It was not until March, 1781, that Virginia passed an Act making all the bills of credit which had been emitted by Congress, and all which had been emitted by the State, a legal tender in payment of debts. Yet they were, in every sense of the word, bills of credit previous to that time, and were productive of all the consequences of paper money. We cannot, then, assent to the proposition ^{436*}that the history of our country furnishes any just argument in favor of that restricted construction of the Constitution for which the counsel for the defendant in error contends.

The certificates for which this note was given, being in truth "bills of credit" in the sense of the Constitution, we are brought to the inquiry:

Is the note valid of which they form the consideration?

It has been long settled that a promise made in consideration of an act which is forbidden by law is void. It will not be questioned that an act forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law, is against law. Now, the Constitution forbids a State to "emit bills of credit." The loan of these certificates is the very act which is forbidden. It is not the making of them while they lie in the loan-offices, but the issuing of them, the putting them into circulation, which is the act of emission—the act that is forbidden by the Constitution. The consideration of this note is the emission of bills of credit by the State. The very act which constitutes the consideration is the act of emitting bills of credit in the mode prescribed by the law of Missouri, which act is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States.

Cases which we cannot distinguish from this in principle have been decided in State courts of great respectability, and in this court. In the case of The Springfield Bank v. Merrick et al. (14 Mass. Rep., 322), a note was made payable in certain bills, the loaning or negotiating of which was prohibited by statute, inflicting a penalty for its violation. The note was held to be void. Had this note been made in consideration of these bills, instead of being made payable in them, it would not have been less repugnant to the statute; and would consequently have been equally void.

In Hunt v. Knickerbocker (5 Johns. Rep., 327), it was decided that an agreement for the sale of tickets in a lottery not authorized by the Legislature of the State, although instituted under the authority of the government of another State, is contrary to the spirit and policy of the law, and void. The consideration on which the agreement was founded being illegal, the agreement was void. The books, both of Massachusetts and New York, ^{437*}abound with cases to the same effect. They turn upon the question whether the particular case is within the principle, not on the principle itself. It has never been doubted that a note given on a consideration which is prohibited by law, is void. Had the issuing or circulation of certificates of this or of any other description been prohibited by a statute of Missouri, could a suit have been sustained in the courts of that State on a note given in consideration of the prohibited certificates? If it could not, are the prohibitions of the Constitution to be held less sacred than those of a State law?

It had been determined, independently of the acts of Congress on that subject, that sailing under the license of an enemy is illegal. Patton v. Nicholson (3 Wheat., 204) was a suit brought in one of the courts of this district on a note given by Nicholson to Patton, both citizens of the United States, for a British license. The United States were then at war with Great Britain, but the license was procured without any intercourse with the enemy. The judgment of the Circuit Court was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out a writ of error. The counsel for the defendant in error was stopped, the court declaring that the use of a license from the enemy being unlawful, one citizen had no right to purchase from or sell to another such a license, to be used on board an American vessel. The consideration for which the note was given being unlawful, it followed of course that the note was void.

A majority of the court feels constrained to say that the consideration on which the note in this case was given is against the highest law of the land, and that the note itself is utterly void. In rendering judgment for the plaintiff, the court for the State of Missouri decided in favor of the validity of a law which is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

In the argument we have been reminded by one side of the dignity of a sovereign state; of the humiliation of her submitting herself to this tribunal; of the dangers which may result from inflicting a wound on that dignity: by the other, of the still superior dignity of the 438] people of the United States, *who have spoken their will in terms which we cannot misunderstand.

To these admonitions we can only answer, that if the exercise of that jurisdiction which has been imposed upon us by the Constitution and laws of the United States shall be calculated to bring on those dangers which have been indicated, or if it shall be indispensable to the preservation of the Union, and consequently, of the independence and liberty of these States, these are considerations which address themselves to those departments which may with perfect propriety be influenced by them. This department can listen only to the mandates of law, and can tread only that path which is marked out by duty.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri for the First Judicial District is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON.

This is a case of a new impression and intrinsic difficulty, and brings up questions of the most vital importance to the interests of this Union.

The declaration is in the ordinary form, and the part of the record of the State court which raises the questions before us, is expressed in these words: "At a court, &c., came the parties, &c., and neither party requiring a jury, the cause is submitted to the court; therefore, all and singular, the matters and things, and evidences, being seen and heard by the court, it is found by them that the said defendants did assume upon themselves in the manner and form as the plaintiffs by their counsel allege; and the court also find that the consideration for which the writing declared upon and the assumpsit was made, was for the loan of loan-office certificates, loaned by the State at her loan-office at Chariton; which certificates were issued and the loan made in the manner pointed out by an Act of the Legislature of Missouri, approved, &c. And the court do further find that the plaintiff hath sustained damages by reason of the nonperformance of the assumptions and undertakings aforesaid, of them the said 439] defendants, *to the sum, &c.; and therefore it is considered that the plaintiff recover," &c.

Peters 4.

U. S., Book 7.

In order to understand the case, it may be proper to premise that the territory now occupied by the State of Missouri having been subject to its Spanish government, was at the time of its cession governed by the civil law as modified by the Spanish government; that it so continued, subject to certain modifications introduced by act of Congress, until it became a State; when the people incorporated into their institutions as much of the civil law as they thought proper: and hence, their courts of justice now partake of a mixed character, perhaps combining all the advantages of the civil and common law forms. By one of the provisions of this law the trial by jury is forced upon no one; is yet open to all, and when not demanded, the court acts the double part of jury and judge.

It is obvious, therefore, that the matter certified from the record of the State court before recited is in nature of a special verdict, and the judgment of the court is upon that verdict, and in this light it shall be examined.

The purport of the finding is that the vote declared upon was given "for a loan of loan-office certificates loaned by the State under certain State acts, the caption of which is given."

Some doubts were thrown out in the argument whether we could take notice of the State laws thus found without being set out at length; but in this there can be no question; whatever laws that court would take notice of, we must of necessity receive and consider, as if fully set out.

By the acts of the State designated by the court in their finding, the officers of the treasury department of the State were authorized to create certificates of small denominations—from ten dollars down to fifty cents—bearing interest at two per centum per annum, and to loan these certificates to individuals; taking in lieu thereof promissory notes, payable not exceeding one year from the date, with not more than six per cent. interest, and redeemable by installments not exceeding ten per cent. every six months, giving mortgages of landed property for security.

*These certificates were in this form: [440 "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury, or any of the loan-offices of the State of Missouri, in the discharge of taxes or debts due the State, for the sum of $——, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date, the —— day of ——, 182 ;" which form is set out in and prescribed by the act designated in the finding of the court.

This writ of error is sued out under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, upon the supposition that the State act is in violation of that provision in the Constitution which prohibits the States from emitting bills of credit; and that the note declared on is void, as having been taken for an illegal consideration, or without consideration.

As a preliminary question, it has been argued that the case is not within the provisions of the twenty-fifth section; because it does not appear from anything on the record that this ground of defense was specially set up in the courts of the State. But this we consider no longer an open question; it has repeatedly been decided by this court, that if a special verdict or the instruction of a court involve such facts as that the judgment must necessarily affirm the validity of the State law, or invalidity of a right set up under the laws or Constitution of the United States, the case is sufficiently brought within the provisions of the twenty-fifth section.

The judgment of the court in this case affirms the validity of the contract on which the suit is instituted. And this could not have been affirmed unless on the assumption that the act in which it had its origin was constitutional.

In the argument of counsel the objections to this contract were presented in the form of objections to the consideration. But this was unnecessary to his argument, since even a valuable consideration will not make good a contract in itself illegal. These notes originate directly under the law of Missouri; they are taken in pursuance of its provisions; have their origin in it; and rest for their validity upon it: and if that law be void, must fall 441 with it. Whether, therefore, *the bills for which they were given be void or valid, if the law be void, the notes would be so.

There are some difficulties on the subject of consideration, for which I would reserve myself until they become unavoidable. But it is not one of those difficulties that, as a guide for the State, the power of the States over the law of contracts will legalize a contract made, under whatever law, or for whatever consideration. That argument makes the act to justify itself, and is a direct recurrence to that exercise of sovereign power which it was the leading principle of the Constitution that each should renounce, so far as it was incompatible with the provisions of the Constitution; the objects of which were the security of individual right and the perpetuation of the Union.

The instrument is a dead letter, unless its effects be to invalidate every act done by the State in violation of the Constitution of the United States. And as the universal modus operandi by free States must be through their Legislature, it follows that the laws under which any act is done, importing a violation of the Constitution, must be a dead letter. The language of the Constitution is, "no State shall emit bills of credit;" and this, if it means anything, must mean that no State shall pass a law which has for its object an emission of bills of credit.

It follows that when the officers of a State undertake to act upon such a law, they act without authority; and that the contracts entered into, direct or incidental to such their illegal proceedings, are mere nullities.

This leads us to the main question: "Was this an emission of bills of credit in the sense of the Constitution?" And here the difficulty which presents itself is to determine whether it was a loan or an emission of paper money; or, perhaps, whether it was not an emission of paper money, under the disguise of a loan. There cannot be a doubt that this latter view of the subject must always be examined; for that which it is not permitted to do directly, cannot be legalized by any change of names or forms. Acts done in fraudem legis, are acts in violation of law.

The great difficulty, as it is here, must ever be to determine, *in each case, whether [442 it be a loan, or an emission of bills of credit. That the States have an unlimited power to effect the one, and are divested of power to do the other, are propositions equally unquestionable; but where to draw the discriminating line is the great difficulty. I fear it is an insuperable difficulty.

The terms, "bills of credit," are in themselves vague and general, and, at the present day, almost dismissed from our language. It is, then, only by resorting to the nomenclature of the day of the Constitution, that we can hope to get at the idea which the framers of the Constitution attached to it. The quotation from Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts, therefore, was a proper one for this purpose; inasmuch as the sense in which a word is used by a distinguished historian, and a man in public life in our own country, not long before the Revolution, furnishes a satisfactory criterion for a definition. It is there used as synonymous with paper money; and we will find it distinctly used in the same sense by the first Congress which met under the present Constitution.

The whole history and legislation of the time prove that by bills of credit, the framers of the Constitution meant paper money, with reference to that which had been used in the States from the commencement of the century down to the time when it ceased to pass, before reduced to its innate worthlessness.

It was contended, in argument for the defendant in error, that it was essential to the description of bills of credit in the sense of the Constitution that they should be made a lawful tender. But his own quotations negative that idea; and the Constitution does the same in the general prohibition in the States to make anything but gold or silver a legal tender. If, however, it were otherwise, it would hardly avail him here, since these certificates were, as to their officers' salaries, declared a legal tender.

The great end and object of this restriction on the power of the States, will furnish the best definition of the terms under consideration. The whole was intended to exclude everything from use as a circulating medium except gold and silver, and to give to the United States the exclusive *control over the coining and [443 valuing of the metallic medium. That the real dollar may represent property, and not the shadow of it.

Now, if a State were to pass a law declaring that this representative of money shall be issued by its officers, this would be a palpable and tangible case; and we could not hesitate to declare such a law, and every contract entered into on the issue of such paper purporting a promise to return the sum borrowed, to be a mere nullity. But suppose a State enacts a law authorizing her officers to borrow a hundred thousand dollars, and to give in lieu thereof certificates of one hundred dollars each, expressing an acknowledgment of the debt; it is presumed there could be no objection to this. Then suppose that the next year she authorizes these certificates to be broken up into ten, five, and even one-dollar bills. Where can be the objection to this? And if, at the institution of the loan, the individual had given for the scrip his note at twelve months, instead of paying the cash; it would be but doing in another form what was here done in Missouri; and what is often done, in principle, where the loan is not required to be paid immediately in cash.

Pursuing the scrutiny farther, and with a view to bringing it as close home to the present case as possible: a State having exhausted its treasury, proposes to anticipate its taxes for one, two, or three years; its citizens, or others, being willing to aid it, give their notes payable at sixty days, and receive the scrip of the State at a premium for the advance of their credit, which enables the State, by discounting these notes, to realize the cash. There could be no objection to this negotiation; and their scrip being by contract to be receivable in taxes, nothing would be more natural than to break it up into small parcels in order to adapt it to the payment of taxes. And if in this State it should be thrown into circulation by passing into the hands of those who would want it to meet their taxes, I see nothing in this that could amount to a violation of the Constitution. Thus far the transaction partakes of the distinctive features of a loan; and yet it cannot be denied that its adaptation to the payment of taxes does give it one 444] characteristic of a circulating *medium. And another point of similitude, if not of identity, is the provision for forcing the receipt of it upon those to whom the State had incurred the obligation to pay money.

The result is, that these certificates are of a truly amphibious character; but what, then, should be the course of this court? My conclusion is, that as it is a doubtful case, for that reason we are bound to pronounce it innocent. It does indeed approach as near to a violation of the Constitution as it can well go without violating its prohibition, but it is in the exercise of an unquestionable right, although in rather a questionable form; and I am bound to believe that it was done in good faith, until the contrary shall more clearly appear.

Believing it, then, a candid exercise of the power of borrowing, I feel myself at liberty to go further, and briefly to suggest two points, on which these bills vary from the distinctive features of the paper money of the Revolution.

1. On the face of them they bear an interest, and for that reason vary in value every moment of their existence: this disqualifies them for the uses and purposes of a circulating medium, which the universal consent of mankind declares should be of an uniform and unchanging value, otherwise it must be the subject of exchange, and not the medium.

2. All the paper medium of the Revolution consisted of promises to pay. This is a promise to receive, and to receive in payment of debts and taxes due the State. This is not an immaterial distinction; for the objection to a mere paper medium is, that its value depends upon mere national faith. But this certainly has a better dependence; the public debtor who purchases it may tender it in payments; and upon a suit brought to recover against him, the Constitution contains another provision to which he may have recourse. As far as the feeble powers of this court extend, he would be secured (if he could ever need security) from a violation of his contracts. This approximates them to bills on a fund, and a fund not to be withdrawn by a law of the State.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the judgment of the State court should be affirmed.

This case comes up by writ of error from the State court of Missouri, on a judgment recovered against the plaintiffs in error in the highest court in that State; and the first question that has been made here, is whether this court has jurisdiction of the case, under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

If the construction of this twenty-fifth section was now for the first time brought before this court, I should entertain very serious doubts whether this case came within it. The fair, and, as I think, the clear import of that section is, that some one of the cases therein stated did, in point of fact, arise, and was drawn into question, and did receive the judgment and decision of the State court. It is not enough that such question might have been made. A party may waive the right secured to him under this section. This would not in any manner affect the jurisdiction of the State court, and might of course be waived. In the present case, there is no doubt but the facts which appeared before the State court presented a case which might properly fall within this section. The defendants might have insisted that the State law was unconstitutional, and that the certificates issued in pursuance of its provisions were void. And if the court had sustained the act, it would have been one of the cases within the twenty-fifth section. But the court was not bound to call upon the party to raise the objection for the purpose of putting the cause in a situation to be brought here by writ of error. It cannot be doubted but that there might have been an express waiver of this right, and I should think an implied waiver would equally preclude a review of the case by this court; and that such a waiver ought to be implied in all cases where it does not appear that in point of fact the question was made, and received the judgment of the State court. But to entertain jurisdiction in this case is perhaps not going farther than this court has already gone; and I do not mean to call in question these decisions; but have barely noticed the question for the purpose of stating the rule by which I think all cases under this section should be tested.

*The more important question upon [446 the merits of the case is, whether the Constitution of the United States interposes any impediment to the plaintiff's right of recovery in this case. And this question has been presented at the bar under the following points:

1. Whether the certificates issued under the provisions of the law of the State of Missouri are bills of credit, within the sense and meaning of the Constitution.

2. If so, whether, as they formed the consideration of the note on which the judgment below was recovered, the note was rendered thereby void and irrecoverable.

The first is a very important question, and not free from difficulty; and one upon which I have entertained serious doubts: but looking at it in all its bearings, and considering the consequences to which the rule established by a majority of the court will lead when carried out to its full extent, I am compelled to dissent from the opinion pronounced in this case.

The limitation upon the powers of the State of Missouri, which is supposed to have been transcended, is contained in the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. "No State shall emit bills of credit." Are the certificates issued under the authority of the Missouri law, bills of credit, within this prohibition?

The form of the certificate is prescribed in the third section of the act (Act 27th of June, 1821) as follows:

"This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury or any of the loan-offices of the State of Missouri in the discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of $—, with interest for the same at two per centum per annum from this date," &c. And the thirteenth section declares, "that the certificates of the said loan-office shall be receivable at the treasury of the State, and by all tax-gatherers and other public officers, in payment of taxes or other moneys now due, or to become due to the State, or any county or town therein; and the said certificates shall also be received by all officers, civil and military, in the State, in the discharge of salaries and fees of office." It is proper here to notice that if the latter branch of this section should be considered as conflicting with that 447 *] prohibition in the Constitution which declares that no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, no such question is involved in the case now before the court, and the law may be good in part, although bad in part.

The precise meaning and interpretation of the terms bills of credit has nowhere been settled; or if it has, it has not fallen within my knowledge. As used in the Constitution, it certainly cannot be applied to all obligations, or vouchers, given by, or under the authority of a State for the payment of money. The right of a State to borrow money cannot be questioned; and this necessarily implies the right of giving some voucher for the repayment; and it would seem to me difficult to maintain the proposition that such a voucher cannot legally and constitutionally assume a negotiable character; and as such, to a certain extent, pass as, or become a substitute for money. The act does not profess to make these certificates a circulating medium or substitute for money. They are (except as relates to public officers) made receivable only for taxes and debts due to the State, and for salt sold by the lessees of salt springs belonging to the State. These are special and limited objects, and these certificates cannot answer the purpose of a circulating medium to any considerable extent.

A simple promise to pay a sum of money, a bond or other security given for the payment of the same, cannot be considered a bill of credit within the sense of the Constitution. Such a construction would take from the States all power to borrow money or execute any obligation for the repayment. The natural and literal meaning of the terms import a bill drawn on credit merely, and not bottomed upon any real or substantial fund for its redemption. There is a material and well-known distinction between a bill drawn upon a fund and one drawn upon credit only. A bill of credit may therefore be considered a bill drawn and resting merely upon the credit of the drawer, as contradistinguished from a fund constituted or pledged for the payment of the bill. Thus, the Constitution vests in Congress the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States. A bill drawn under such authority would be a bill of credit. And this idea is more fully expressed in the old confederation (Art. 9): "Congress shall have power to borrow money or emit bills on the credit of the United States." Can the certificates issued under the Missouri law, according to the fair and reasonable construction of the act, be said to rest on the credit of the State? Although the securities taken for the certificates loaned are not in terms pledged for their redemption, yet these securities constitute a fund amply sufficient for that purpose, and may well be considered a fund provided for that purpose. The certificates are a mere loan upon security in double the amount loaned. And in addition thereto (section 29), provision is made expressly for constituting a fund for the redemption of these certificates. These are guards and checks against their depreciation, by insuring their ultimate redemption.

The emissions of paper money by the States previous to the adoption of the Constitution, were, properly speaking, bills of credit; not being bottomed upon any fund constituted for their redemption, but resting solely for that purpose upon the credit of the State issuing the same. There was no check, therefore, upon excessive issues; and a great depreciation and loss to holders of such bills followed as matter of course. But when a fund is pledged, or ample provision made for the redemption of a bill or voucher, whatever it may be called, there is but little danger of a depreciation or loss.

But should these certificates be considered bills of credit? Under an enlarged sense of such an instrument, it does not necessarily follow that they are bills of credit within the sense and meaning of the Constitution. As no precise and technical meaning or interpretation of a bill of credit has been shown, we may with propriety look to the state of things at the adoption of the Constitution to ascertain what was probably the understanding of the convention by this limitation on the power of the States. The State emissions of paper money had been excessive, and productive of great mischief. In some States, and at some times, such emissions were, by law, made a tender in payment of private debts: in others not so. But the great evil that existed was, that creditors 449 were compelled to take such a depreciated currency and articles of property in payment of their debts. This being the mischief, is it an unfair construction of the Constitution to restrict the intended remedy to the acknowledged and real mischief. The language of the Constitution may perhaps be too broad to admit of this restricted application. But to consider the certificates in question bills of credit within the Constitution, is, in my judgment, a construction of that instrument which will lead to serious embarrassment with State legislation, as existing in almost every member of the Union.

If these certificates are bills of credit, inhibited by the Constitution, it appears to me difficult to escape the conclusion that all bank notes, issued either by the States, or under their authority and permission, are bills of credit falling within the prohibition. They are, certainly, in point of form, as much bills of credit; and if being used as a circulating medium, or substitute for money, makes these certificates bills of credit, bank notes are more emphatically such. And not only the notes of banks directly under the management and control of a State (of which description of banks there are several in the United States), but all notes of banks established under the authority of a State, must fall within the prohibition. For the States cannot certainly do that indirectly which they cannot do directly. And, if they cannot issue bank notes because they are bills of credit, they cannot authorize others to do it. If this circuitous mode of doing the business would take the case out of the prohibition, it would equally apply to the Missouri certificates; for they were issued by persons acting under the authority of the State, and, indeed, could be issued in no other way.

This prohibition in the Constitution could not have been intended to take from the States all power whatever over a local circulating medium, and to suppress all paper currency of every description. The power is given to Congress to coin money, and the States are prohibited from coining money. But to construe this as embracing a paper circulating medium of every description, and thereby render illegal ^{450*} the issuing of all bank notes by or under the authority of the States, will not, I presume, be contended for by anyone. And I am unable to discover any sound and substantial reason why the prohibition does not reach all such bank notes, if it extends to the certificates in question.

The conclusion to which I have come on this point renders it unnecessary for me to examine the second question made at the argument. I am of opinion that the judgment of the State court ought to be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McLEAN.

Several cases, depending upon the same principles, were brought into this court from the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri by writs of error.

In the case of Hiram Craig and others, the declaration sets forth the cause of action in the following terms, viz.: "For that whereas, heretofore, on the 1st day of August, in the year of our Lord 1822, at the county, &c., the said Craig, John Moore, and Ephraim Moore, made their certain promissory note in writing, bearing date, &c., and then and there, for value received, jointly and severally, promised to pay to the State of Missouri, on the 1st day of November, 1822, at the loan-office in Chariton, the sum of one hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-nine cents, and the two per centum per annum, the interest accruing on the certificates borrowed from the 1st day of October, 1821, nevertheless," &c.

The general issue of non assumpsit having been pleaded in each case, the Circuit Court of Chariton, in which the suits were commenced, rendered judgments in favor of the plaintiff.

Peters 4.

The following entry, in the case of Craig and others, was made on the record: "And afterwards at a court begun and held at Chariton, on Monday, the 1st of November, 1824, and on the second day of said court, the parties, by their attorneys, appeared, and neither party requiring a jury, the cause is submitted to the court; therefore, all and singular the matters and things and evidences being seen and heard by the court, it is found by them that the said defendants did assume upon themselves in manner and form as the plaintiff's counsel allege; and the court also find that the consideration *for which the writing declared upon and the assumpsit was made, was for the loan of loan-office certificates, loaned by the State, at her loan-office at Chariton; which certificates were issued, and the loan made in the manner pointed out by an Act of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, approved the 27th day of June, 1821, entitled 'An Act for the establishment of loan-offices, and the acts amendatory and supplementary thereto.' And the court do further find that the plaintiff hath sustained damages, by reason of the nonperformance of the assumptions and undertakings of the said defendants, to the sum of two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and seventy-nine cents. Therefore, it is considered," &c.

An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Missouri, in which this judgment and the others were affirmed.

The first question which this case presents for consideration, arises under the twenty fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789; which provides "that a final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity," may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error.

Had not the point been settled by several adjudications in similar cases, I should entertain strong doubts whether it sufficiently appeared on the record that the validity of the statute of Missouri was drawn in question, on account of its repugnance to the Constitution. In the finding of the Chariton Circuit Court the act is referred to and the consideration of the note is stated; but it nowhere appears in the record that the validity of the statute was contested. And as this is the only ground on which this court can take jurisdiction of the case, it would seem to me that it should not be left to inference, but be clearly stated in the proceeding.

In the Supreme Court of Missouri the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed; but it does not appear what objections *to the ⁴⁵² affirmation were urged before the court. This question, however, seems not to be open, and I yield to the force of prior adjudications. Two points must necessarily be considered in the investigation of the merits of this case.

1. Are the certificates authorized to be issued by the law of Missouri, bills of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution?

2. If they are bills of credit, is the note on which this suit was brought void?

It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error that any paper issued by a State that contains a promise to pay a certain sum, and is intended to be used as a medium of circulation, is a bill of credit, and comes within the mischief against which the Constitution intended to guard. In illustration of this position, a reference is made to the depreciated currency of the Revolution.

During that most eventful period of our history, bills of credit formed the currency of the country; and every thing of greater value was excluded from circulation. These bills were so multiplied by the different States and by Congress that their value was greatly impaired. This loss was attempted to be covered, and the growing wants of the government supplied, by increased emissions. These caused a still more rapid depreciation, until the credit of the bills sunk so low as not to be current at any price. Various statutes were passed to force their circulation and sustain their value, but they proved ineffectual. For a time, creditors were compelled to receive these bills under the penalty of forfeiting their debt; losing the interest; being denounced as enemies to the country, or some other penalty. These laws destroyed all just relations between creditor and debtor; and so debased a currency produced the most serious evils in almost all the relations of society. Nothing but the ardor of the most elevated patriotism could overcome the difficulties and embarrassments growing out of this state of things.

It will be found somewhat difficult to give a satisfactory definition of a bill of credit. In what sense it was used in the Constitution, is the object of inquiry.

453* Different nations of Europe have emitted, on various emergencies, three descriptions of paper money: 1. Notes stamped with a certain value, which contained no promise of payment, but were to pass as money. 2. Notes receivable in payment of public dues, with or without interest. 3. Notes which the government promised to pay at a future period specified, with or without interest, and which were made receivable in payment of taxes and all debts to the public.

Bills of the last class were issued during the Revolution; and in some of the colonies they had been emitted long before that time. In 1690 bills of credit were for the first time issued, as a substitute for money, in the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, as stated in Hutchinson's History. In 1716 a large emission was made and lent to the inhabitants, to be paid at a certain period; and in the meantime to pass as money. For forty years, the historian says, the currency was in much the same state as if an hundred thousand pounds sterling had been stamped on pieces of leather or paper of various denominations, and declared to be the money of the government, without any other sanction than this: that when there should be taxes to pay, the treasury would receive this sort of money, and that every creditor should be obliged to receive it from his debtor.

The bills issued during the Revolution were denominated bills of credit. In 1780 the United States guaranteed the payment of bills emitted by the States. They all contained a promise of payment at a future day; and where they were not made a legal tender, creditors were often compelled to receive them in payment of debts, or subject themselves to great inconvenience and peril.

The character of these bills, and the evils which resulted from their circulation, give the true definition of a bill of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution, and of the mischiefs against which the Constitution provides.

The following is the form of the bills emitted in 1780, under the guarantee of Congress: "The possessor of this bill shall be paid — Spanish milled dollars by the 31st day of December, 1786, with interest, in like money, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, [454 by the State of —, according to an act," &c.

Bills of credit were denominated current money, and were often referred to in the proceedings of Congress by that title, in contradistinction to loan-office certificates. It is reasonable to suppose that in using the term "bills of credit" in the Constitution, such bills were meant as were known at the time by that denomination. If the term be susceptible of a broader signification, it would not be safe so to construe it; as it would extend the provision beyond the evil intended to be prevented, and instead of operating as a salutary restraint, might be productive of serious mischief. The words of the Constitution must always be construed according to their plain import, looking at their connection and the object in view. Under this rule of construction, I have come to the conclusion that to constitute a bill of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution, it must be issued by a State, and its circulation as money enforced by statutory provisions. It must contain a promise of payment by the State generally, when no fund has been appropriated to enable the holder to convert it into money. It must be circulated on the credit of the State; not that it will be paid on presentation, but that the State, at some future period, on a time fixed, or resting in its own discretion, will provide for the payment.

If a more extended definition than this were given to the term, it would produce the most serious embarrassments to the fiscal operations of a State. Every State in the transactions of its moneyed concerns has one department to investigate and pass accounts, and another to pay them. Where a warrant is issued for the amount due to a claimant, which is to be paid on presentation to the treasurer, can it be denominated a bill of credit? And may not this warrant be negotiated, and passed in ordinary transactions, as money? This is very common in some of the States, and yet it has not been supposed to be an infraction of the Constitution.

Audited bills are often found in circulation, in which the State promises to pay a certain sum, at some future day specified. If these are inhibited by the Constitution, can a State make loans of money? Can there be any difference between borrowing money from a creditor, [455 itor, and any other person who does not stand in that relation? The amount cannot alter the principle. If a State may borrow one hundred thousand dollars, she may borrow a less sum; and if an obligation to pay with or without interest may be given in the one case, it may in the other.

Where money is borrowed by a State, it issues scrip which contains a promise to pay, according to the terms of the contract. If the lender, for his own convenience, prefers this scrip in small denominations, may not the State accommodate him? This may be made a condition of the loan. If a State shall think proper to borrow money of its own citizens in sums of five, ten, or twenty dollars, may it not do so? If it be unable to meet the claims of its creditors, shall it be prohibited from acknowledging the claims, and promising payments with interest at a future day? The principles of justice and sound policy alike require this; and unless the right of the State to do so be clearly inhibited, it must be admitted.

In the adjustment of claims against a county, orders are issued on the county treasury; and it is common for these to circulate, by delivery or assignment, as bank notes or bills of exchange.

May a State do, indirectly, that which the Constitution prohibits it from doing directly? If it cannot issue a bill or note which may be put into circulation as a substitute for money, can it, by an act of incorporation, authorize a company to issue bank bills on the capital of the State? It will thus be seen that if an extended construction be given to the term "bills of credit," as used in the Constitution, it may be made to embrace almost every description of paper issued by a State.

The words of the Constitution are, that "no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debt; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts; or grant any title of nobility."

456* Under the statute of Missouri, certificates in the following forms were issued: "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury, or any of the loan-offices of the State of Missouri, in the discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of _____ dollars, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum, from this date, the _____ day of _____. 182 .

It appears by the third section of the act, that two hundred thousand dollars were authorized to be issued of the above certificates, each not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents. By the thirteenth section, these certificates were made receivable at the State treasury by tax-gatherers and other public officers, in payment of taxes or money due to the State, or any county or town therein; and they were made receivable by all officers in payment of salaries and fees of office.

Under the fifteenth section, commissioners were authorized to loan these certificates to the citizens of the State; apportioning the amount among the several counties according to the population, on mortgages or personal security. The act provides the means by which these certificates shall be paid, and the fact is admitted that at this time they are all redeemed by the State.

The design in issuing these certificates seems Peters 4.

to have been to furnish the citizens of Missouri with the means of paying to the State the taxes which it imposed, and other debts due to it. It was, in effect, giving a credit to the debtors of the State, provided they would give good real or personal security. Had the arrangement been confined to those who owed the State, and had certificates been required of them, promising to pay the amount, with interest; no objection could have been urged to the legality of the transaction. And even if the State, in the discharge of its debts, had paid such certificates, the act would not have been illegal.

The State of Missouri adopted no measures to force the circulation of the above certificates. No creditor was under any obligation to receive them. By refusing them, his debt was not postponed, nor the interest upon it suspended. The *object was a benign one, to [457 relieve the citizens from an extraordinary pressure produced by the failure of local banks, and the utter worthlessness of the currency. Without aid from the government, the citizens of Missouri could not have paid the taxes or debts which they owed to the State, in a medium of any value. At such a crisis the law was enacted; and, as contemplated in its passage, so soon as the necessary relief was afforded, the paper was withdrawn from circulation. The measure was only felt in the benefits it conferred. No loss was sustained by the public or by individuals, unless, indeed, the State shall lose by the unconscionable defense set up to these actions.

It is admitted that the expediency or inexpediency of a measure cannot be considered, in giving a construction to the Constitution. But when, in giving a construction to that instrument, it becomes necessary, as it does in some instances, to look into the mischiefs provided against; and the application becomes, to some extent, a matter of inference, the question of expediency must be considered.

If the act of Missouri conferred benefits upon the people of the State, and was so guarded in its provisions as to protect them from all possible evil, no court would feel inclined to declare it to be unconstitutional and void, unless it was directly opposed to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. As the spirit of that provision was to protect the citizens of the States against the evils of a debased currency, and as the act under consideration, so far as it operated upon the people of Missouri, had no tendency to produce this evil, but to relieve against it, the spirit of the Constitution was not violated. Was the act of Missouri against its letter? Were the certificates issued by the State "bills of credit?" They were not, if the definition of a bill of credit, as now given, be correct. Their circulation was not forced by statutory provision, in any form; there was no promise on their face to pay at any future day: in their form and substance they bore little or no resemblance to the continental bills. They were calculated, from the manner in which they were created and circulated, to introduce none of the evils so deeply felt from the currency of the revolution.

*Suppose the State of Missouri had [458 stamped certificates with a certain value, and provided that they should be received as money, according to the denominations given them, could they have been called bills of credit? Certainly not; for they contained no promise of payment, to which the holder could give credit. Such an act by a State would most clearly be void; but not under the provision of the Constitution, which prohibits a State from issuing "bills of credit."

Can any certificate or bill be considered a bill of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution, to which the receiver must not give credit to the promise of the State? Must it not, literally, be a "bill of credit?" Not a bill which will be received in payment of public dues when presented, but which the State promises to redeem at a future day.

A substitution of the credit of the State for money, may be considered as an essential ingredient to constitute a "bill of credit." When this is wanting, whatever other designation may be given to the thing—whether it be called paper money or a State bill—it cannot be called a "bill of credit." The credit refers to a future time of payment and not to the confidence we feel in the punctuality of the State, in paying the bill when presented. A bill, therefore, which is payable on presentation, is not a bill of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution; nor is a bill which contains no promise to pay at a future day, but a simple declaration, that it will be received in payment of public dues.

If this course of argument appears somewhat technical, it must be recollected that the question under consideration involves the validity of an act of a State, which is sovereign in all matters, except where restrictions are imposed, and an express delegation of power is made to the federal government. The solemn act of a State, which has been sanctioned by all the branches of its power, cannot, under any circumstances, be lightly regarded. The act of Missouri having received the sanction of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the government, cannot be set aside and disregarded under a doubtful construction of the Constitution. Doubts should lead to an acquiescence in the act. The power which declares it null and void should be exercised only where the right to do so is perfectly clear.

That such a power is vested in this tribunal by the Constitution, which received the sanction of all the States, can only be doubted by those who are incapable of comprehending the plainest principle in constitutional law. It is a question arising under the Constitution, and all such questions of power, whether in the general or State governments, belong to this tribunal. The policy of this investiture of power may be questioned; but the fact of its existence cannot be. Believing that in every point of view in which the paper issued by the State of Missouri may be considered, it is at least doubtful whether it comes within the meaning of a "bill of credit" prohibited by the Constitution; I am inclined to affirm the judgment of the State court. But if this ground of the defense be admitted, does it follow that the judgment must be reversed. This presents for consideration the second proposition stated.

If the certificates under consideration were "bills of credit" within the meaning of the Constitution, is the note on which this suit is brought void?

The position assumed in the argument that no contract can be valid that is founded upon a consideration which is contrary to good morals, against the policy of the law, or a positive statute, cannot be sustained to the extent as urged. The ground is admitted to be correct, generally; but there are exceptions which it becomes important to notice.

In the State of Pennsylvania usury is prohibited under the sanction of certain penalties, but usury does not render the contract void; a recovery may be had upon it, with the legal rate of interest. It is competent for a State to prohibit gambling by a severe penalty; and yet to provide that an obligation given for money lost at gambling shall be valid. It may declare, by law, that all instruments for the payment of money, signed by the party, shall be held valid without reference to the consideration. The legislative power of a State over contracts is without restriction by the Constitution of the United States; except that their obligation cannot be impaired. With this single exception, a State Legislature may regulate contracts, both as to their form and substance, as may be thought advisable.

Suppose the constitution of Missouri had prohibited the emission of bills of credit without going further; might not the Legislature provide by law that obligations given on a loan of such bills should be valid? There would be no more inconsistency in this than in the law of Pennsylvania, which forbids usury, and yet holds the instrument valid. If the Constitution of the United States had provided that all obligations given for bills of credit, or where they formed a part of the consideration, should be void, there could have existed no doubt on the subject. But there is no such provision; and if the obligation be held void, its invalidity is a matter of inference, arising from the supposed illegality of the consideration. The Constitution prohibits a State from "emitting bills of credit." The law of Missouri declares, substantially, that obligations given, where these bills form the consideration, shall be held valid. Is there an incompatibility in these provisions? Does the latter destroy the former, or render it ineffectual?

Suppose a State should coin money, would such money not constitute a valuable consideration for a promissory note? Would not the intrinsic value of the silver, as bullion, be a sufficient consideration? Would such a construction conflict with the Constitution?

A State is prohibited from coining money; consequently the money which it may coin cannot be circulated as such. A creditor will be under no obligation to receive it in discharge of his debt. If any statutory provision of the State should be formed, with a view of forcing the circulation of such coin, by suspending the interest or postponing the debt of a creditor where it was refused, such statute would be void, because it would act on the thing prohibited, and come directly in conflict with the Constitution. Such would not be the case in reference to the obligation given for this coin.

In the first place, the act would be voluntary on the part of the purchaser; and in the second, the consideration would be a valuable one. The statute sanctions not the coin, but the obligation which was given for it. The act of creating the consideration may be denounced and punished, as in the case of usury in Pennsylvania, and yet the obligation held good. Would this construction render ineffectual the prohibition of the Constitution? This may be answered by considering how ineffectual this provision must be, if its efficacy depend on making void the contract.

The loaning of this coin is only one of many modes which a State might adopt to circulate it. In the payment of its creditors, and in works of improvement, the State could always find the most ample means of circulation.

Effect is given to this provision of the Constitution by limiting it to the thing prohibited. If a State emit bills of credit, or coin money, neither can pass as money, whatever may be the regulation on the subject. No penalties have been provided to prevent such a circulation; no sanctions to enforce it would be valid.

But, it is contended that the offense consists in circulating the bills; that being the meaning of the word "emit." Congress may issue bills of credit, and perhaps have done so in the emissions of treasury notes: is a State prohibited from circulating them? If not, it must be admitted, the violation of the Constitution consists, not in the circulation of such bills, but in their creation.

The prohibition of the Constitution was intended to act on the sovereignty of a State in its legislative capacity. But there is no power in the federal government which can act upon this sovereignty. It is only when its inhibited acts affect the rights of individuals, that the judicial power of the Union can be interposed.

If a State Legislature pass an ex post facto law, or a law impairing the obligation of contracts, it remains a harmless enactment on the statute book until it is brought to bear, injuriously, on individual rights. So, if a State coin money or emit bills of credit, the question of right must be raised before this tribunal, in the same manner.

The law of Missouri expressly sanctions the obligations given on a loan of these certificates. Had not this been done, and if the certificates 462] were bills of credit within the *meaning of the Constitution, the obligations might have been considered void, as against the policy of the supreme law of the land.

There is no pretense that there has been a failure of consideration for which the notes in controversy were given. The certificates have long since been received by the State as money, and the promisors have realized their full value. If they can avoid the payment of their notes, as they wish to do by the defense set up, it must be alone on the ground of the illegality of the consideration. Suppose the notes had been given, under the same circumstances, payable to an individual, from whom the consideration had been received; could the defense be sustained?

In such a case there could be no allegation of a failure of consideration. The Constitution prohibits the State from issuing the certificates; but the law of Missouri declares, that obligations given for these certificates shall be valid. These notes, being given for a valuable consideration, may be enforced, unless the Constitution makes them void. This it does not do by express provision; and can they be avoided by inference? An inference which does not necessarily follow, as has been shown, from the prohibition; because such a consequence is prevented by the act of Missouri. This act may be void as to the emission of the bills, but it does not follow that the part which relates to the notes must also be void. It would seem, therefore, that effect may be given to the provision of the Constitution so as to prevent the mischief, by operating upon the circulation of the bills, without extending the consequence so as to make void the contract expressly sanctioned by the law of Missouri. And if such a construction may be given, will not the court incline to give it, in order that both laws may be carried into full effect, where their provisions do not come directly in conflict?

The passing of counterfeit money is prohibited under severe penalties by the laws of every State; and is it not in the power of a State to provide by law, that every obligation given for counterfeit paper, known to be such by both parties, shall be valid. This will scarcely be denied. And if *a State may do this, [463 under its sovereign power to regulate contracts, may it not give validity to the notes under consideration. Had not the State of Missouri a right to provide that every citizen who should voluntarily execute an obligation for the payment of money to the State, should be held bound to pay it, although given without consideration. If this do not come within the province of legislation in a sovereign State, I know not where its powers may not be restricted. And if this may be done, can the notes under consideration be held void? If the certificates were illegally created, they were of value, and under the law of Missouri constituted a valuable consideration for the notes given. In any view, the notes which were executed being sanctioned by law, and consequently valid even without consideration, cannot be less so when given for the certificates. I am, therefore, inclined to say, not without great hesitation, as I differ with the majority of the court, that the judgment should be affirmed on this ground.

In the first place, then, from the consideration which I have been able to give this case, I am not convinced that the certificates issued by the State of Missouri were bills of credit, within the meaning of the Constitution. And unless my conviction was clear on this point, my duty and inclination unite to sustain the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri. And second, as has been shown, it appears to me that the contract on which this action is founded is not void; even admitting that the certificates were bills of credit.

All questions of power arising under the Constitution of the United States, whether they relate to the federal or a State government, must be considered of great importance. The federal government being formed for certain purposes, is limited in its powers, and can in no case exercise authority where the power has not been delegated. The States are sovereign, with the exception of certain powers, which have been invested in the general government, and inhibited to the States. No State can coin money, emit bills of credit, pass ex post facto laws, or laws impairing the obligation of contracts, &c. If any State violate a provision of the Constitution, or be charged with 464] such violation to the injury of *private rights, the question is made before this tribunal; to whom all such questions, under the Constitution, of right belong. In such a case, this court is to the State what its own Supreme Court would be, where the constitutionality of a law was questioned under the constitution of the State. And within the delegation of power, the decision of this court is as final and conclusive on the State as would be the decision of its own court in the case stated.

That distinct sovereignties could exist under one government, emanating from the same people, was a phenomenon in the political world which the wisest statesmen in Europe could not comprehend; and of its practicability many in our own country entertained the most serious doubts. Thus far the friends of liberty have had great cause of triumph in the success of the principles upon which our government rests. But all must admit that the purity and permanency of this system depend on its faithful administration. The States and the federal government have their respective orbits, within which each must revolve. If either cross the sphere of the other, the harmony of the system is destroyed, and its strength is impaired. It would be as gross usurpation on the part of the federal government to interfere with State rights by an exercise of powers not delegated, as it would be for a State to interpose its authority against a law of the Union.

The judiciary of a State, in all cases brought before them, have a right to decide whether or not an act of the federal government be constitutional, the same as they have a right to determine on the constitutionality of an act under the State constitution; but, in all such cases, this tribunal may supervise the decisions. It is often a difficult matter to define the limitations of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers of a State; and this difficulty is greater in defining the limitations of the federal government. In both cases, the respective constitutions must be looked to as the source of power; but in the latter, it is often necessary to determine not only whether the power be vested, but whether it is inhibited to the State. Some powers in the general government are exclusive; others concurrent with the States. The experience of many years may be necessary to establish, 465] by practical illustrations, the exact boundaries of these powers, if, indeed, they can ever be clearly and satisfactorily defined. Like the colors of the rainbow they seem to intermix, so as to render a separation extremely difficult, if not impracticable. By the exercise of a spirit of mutual forbearance, the line may be ascertained with sufficient precision for all practical purposes. In a State where doubts exist as to the investiture of power, it should not be exercised, but referred to the people; in the general government, should similar doubts arise, the powers should be referred to the States and the people.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri for the First Judicial District, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that there is error in the rendition of the judgment of the said court in this, that in affirming the judgment rendered by the Circuit Court for the County of Chariton, that court has given an opinion in favor of the validity of the Act of the Legislature of Missouri, passed on the 27th of June, 1821, entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices," which act is, in the opinion of this court, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; whereupon it is considered by the court, that the said judgment of the said Supreme Court of the State of Missouri for the First Judicial District ought to be reversed and annulled; and the same is hereby reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the defendant to the original action.

HENRY HOLLINGSWORTH, Heir [*466
of LEVI HOLLINGSWORTH, Appellant,

v.

PHILIP BARBOUR ET AL., Appellees.

Purchase of land warrants by parol agreement—bill in equity against "unknown heirs" of vendor—Kentucky laws as to absent defendants—claim of a "locator."

H. entered, with the proper surveyor for the District of Kentucky, forty-five thousand acres of land, in the County of Washington in that State, by virtue of treasury warrants. A survey was made thereon in 1786, and a patent for the land issued to H. in 1797. The warrants were purchased by the ancestor of the complainant by a parol agreement with H. previous to their entry. Before this agreement, H., in connection with a person who owned other warrants, had made an agreement with S. to locate their respective warrants, which agreement was ratified by the complainant, who paid a sum of money to S. for fees of patenting, and agreed to make S. a liberal compensation for his services; and S. located and surveyed under the warrants, forty-five thousand acres, returned the surveys to the office, and paid the fees of office. The locating and surveying of the warrants, and all the necessary steps for completing the title, were done by S., who was employed first by H., and afterwards by the complainant, who paid in money for the same. H. being deceased, and having made no conveyance of the legal title to the lands, the complainant filed a bill in the County of Washington "against the unknown heirs of H.," and in 1815 a decree was made by that court, for a conveyance of the lands by the unknown heirs, or in their default by a commissioner, appointed in the decree to make the same. Held, that the conveyance was not authorized by the laws of Kentucky in force at the time of the decree.

By this general law of the land, no court is authorized to render a judgment or decree against anyone, or his estate, until after due notice by service of process to appear and defend. [472]

The acts of the Assembly of Kentucky authorizing proceedings against absent defendants referred to and examined. [472]

The statute under which the proceedings of the complainants in this case were instituted, authorized the court to make a decree for a conveyance in a suit for such a conveyance, only in the case in which the complainant claims the land as locator, or by bond or other instrument in writing. [473]

The claim of "a locator" is peculiar to Kentucky, and has been universally understood by the people of the country to signify that compensation of a portion of the land located, agreed to be given by the owner of the warrant, to the locator of it for his services. [473]

heirs" is no evidence that any such heirs existed; and the decree and deed made in pursuance of it, cannot avail to pass any title without some evidence that there were some heirs. [477]

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the District of Kentucky.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Sheffey for the appellants, and by Mr. Wickliffe for the appellees.

467* Mr. Justice BALDWIN delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a bill filed on the equity side of the court by the appellants, setting forth that on the 21st of February, 1784, a certain John Abel Hamlin entered, with the proper surveyor for the District of Kentucky, forty-five thousand acres of land lying in the County of Washington, by virtue of sundry treasury warrants issued by the State of Virginia. That a survey was made thereon on the 13th of April, 1786, and a patent issued the 8th of June, 1798, to the said John Abel Hamlin. That previous to the date of such entry the complainant had purchased from the said Hamlin the warrants on which the entry and surveys had been made, for the sum of three thousand seven hundred dollars, which he paid. That although the entries, survey and patent were in the name of said Hamlin, they were for the benefit of the complainant, who alleged the equitable title thereto as belonging to him. That Hamlin being dead, without having made a conveyance, the complainant in 1814 exhibited his bill in chancery in the Circuit Court for the County of Washington against the unknown heirs of said Hamlin, and obtained a decree of said court, ordering them to convey to him the legal title of said lands, by a day named in said decree; in default whereof the court appointed a commissioner for that purpose, who, by deed approved by the court, conveyed the same to the complainant on the 15th of August, 1815: by virtue of which decree and conveyance he became vested with the right, title and interest of said Hamlin to all the lands embraced in the patent of the commonwealth to him.

The bill then sets forth that the defendants, sixty-six in number, had obtained grants of various portions of the land patented to Hamlin, and were in possession of the same, by virtue of warrants, entries and surveys adverse to his; and concludes with a prayer against the appellees, the respondents below, that they may be compelled to convey to the complainant the land claimed by them respectively under their patents, which were elder than the one to Hamlin.

In support of the allegations of his bill, the complainant produced the entries, survey and patent before mentioned, but offered no evidence of any contract, written or parol, between *him and Hamlin for the sale of [*468 these lands; and did not attempt to rest his claim to hold the title of Hamlin on any other authority than the decree of the Circuit Court of Washington County, and the deed of the commissioner appointed to execute the conveyance to him of the lands included in the patent. In the court below, the defendants, in their answers, made various objections to the entries on Hamlin's warrants; set up title in themselves by the patents under which they claimed and their long possession of the lands within their respective surveys, for a period in many of the cases exceeding, and in few falling short of the period prescribed by the act of limitation.

If this court entertained a doubt of the validity of the decree rendered by the Circuit Court of the County of Washington, ordering a conveyance of the title of Hamlin in the lands in question to Hollingsworth, we should feel it our duty to enter into the consideration of all the questions arising on the bill, answer, and exhibits in this case.

When the case was first reached on the calendar, no counsel appeared on the part of the appellants. The counsel of the appellees brought the case before the court, and presented the various points which arose at the hearing in the Circuit Court; beginning with the first in order, the right of Hollingsworth to put himself in place of Hamlin, as to a remedy against the appellants. He was informed by the court that, as then advised, they did not wish to hear him on the other points. Counsel afterwards appearing for the appellants and requesting to be heard, the court directed an argument on what then appeared to them the turning question on the whole case. We have carefully weighed the reasons urged for a reversal of the decree of the court below on that ground, and still retain the opinion formed on the ex-parte argument—that the decree in the case of Hollingsworth against the unknown heirs of Hamlin, and the deed executed by the commissioners pursuant thereto, was void, and wholly inoperative to transfer any title; and that Hollingsworth, or his heir, had no right to call on the appellees to transfer their prior legal title to him, as representing Hamlin or his heirs: that be the title of the *appellees [*469 good or bad, the complainant had no equity against them. Being a stranger to Hamlin's title, he had no right to any conveyance to himself, or any relief sought for by the bill now under the consideration of the court.

The original bill against the unknown heirs of Hamlin thus deduces the complainant's right

NOTE.—Judgments, service of notice to appear and defend, when necessary to their validity.

A judgment in personam, recovered without any notice, and without any attachment of property on mesne process, though authorized by a law of the territory in one of the courts in which it was rendered, is a nullity. Webster v. Reid, 11 How., 437.

The rule that a judgment or decree of one State must receive full faith in the courts of another State, does not apply to judgments rendered in proceedings instituted without personal notice to the defendant. Such judgments, though they may be authorized by statutes of the States in which they are rendered, are not within the meaning of the rule. To render a judgment binding outside the State, it must be founded on personal notice to the party to be affected. Gurner v. United States, 11 How., 163; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How., 165; Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How., 334; Warren Manufacturing Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 2 Paine, 501.

That a decree, obtained without service, may be impeached, and to what extent the jurisdiction of the court rendering a judgment may be inquired into collaterally, see note to Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481.

to a decree for the conveyance of the legal title vested in Hamlin or his heirs by the entries, survey, and patent before referred to: that Hamlin was indebted to the complainant in the sum of about four thousand dollars by book account; that he had absconded, and complainant took a writ of attachment against his effects, out of the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Philadelphia, of September Term, 1784; that in execution of that writ the sheriff broke open the counting-house of Hamlin, but found no property therein except thirty-nine Virginia warrants for ninety thousand acres of land, of which he took possession, but made no return of them on the writ: that Hamlin some time afterwards returned to Philadelphia, being wholly insolvent, and proposed to complainant that he should take the warrants for the sum of three thousand seven hundred dollars, to which he assented, and gave Hamlin a credit to that amount on the account; that the warrants were accordingly delivered to the complainant, but without any transfer or assignment in writing. That before the circumstances of Hamlin became desperate, he had, in co-operation with a person who owned some Virginia warrants, made an agreement with Benjamin Stevens, of New Jersey, to locate their respective warrants; which agreement was ratified by the complainant, who paid to Stevens one hundred and twenty-three pounds eight shillings and nine pence, Pennsylvania currency, for fees of patenting, &c., and further agreed to make Stevens a liberal compensation for his personal labor; and he then commenced the business of locating, surveying, &c.: that Stevens made entries and executed surveys of forty-five thousand acres (the lands in controversy), returned the plats and certificates of survey to the register's office, and paid the fees of office.

It thus appearing from the complainant's 470 allegations in his bill that the locating and surveying of the warrants, and all the steps necessary to the completion of the title were done by Stevens, who was employed for that purpose, first by Hamlin and afterwards by himself, and that his services were compensated by money, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other matters set forth by the complainant. Not being a "locator" of these lands, and showing the location to have been made by another, he excluded himself from all pretense of claiming a right to proceed as such against the unknown heirs of Hamlin.

The Circuit Court of Washington County could take cognizance of the case presented to them by the complainant by no principle of the common law, or rule of the court of equity. Their powers to do so must be conferred by some law of Kentucky within which the complainant must have brought himself, or the proceedings would be void for want of jurisdiction in the court. As this court fully concurs with the views taken of this course by the late learned and lamented Mr. Justice Trimble, who pronounced the decree of the Circuit Court in a very lucid and elaborate opinion returned with the record, we deem it wholly unnecessary to do more than to refer to it as containing the reasons of the decree, which we unanimously approve.

"This is a controversy for land under conflicting adverse titles. The complainant claims the land by virtue of two entries made with the surveyor of Washington County on the 23d of February, 1784, in the name of John Abel Hamlin; an inclusive survey of these entries made on the 12th day of April, 1786; a grant issued thereon to John Abel Hamlin on the 8th day of June, 1797; and a deed of conveyance made by a commissioner on behalf of the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin to the complainant, in obedience to and in pursuance of a decree of the Circuit Court for the County of Washington. The defendants claimed the land under and by virtue of sundry entries, surveys and grants, elder than the grant to John Abel Hamlin. The defendants, in their answers, controvert the validity of John Abel Hamlin's entries; insist that John Abel Hamlin and his heirs, if he left any, were aliens, incapable of taking, holding, or conveying real estate*; deny that John Abel Ham- [471 lin left any heirs to inherit his title, and deny that the complainant has any interest in or title to the estate of John Abel Hamlin in the premises. They further rely on their elder legal titles; insist upon the validity and superiority of the several entries under which they hold; and in bar of the relief sought by the bill, allege they have had upwards of twenty years' adverse possession of the land in controversy, prior to the institution of this suit.

"It is argued for the defendants that the decree of the Washington Circuit Court is void, and that no title passed by it and the commissioner's deed made in pursuance of it to the complainant.

"It must be conceded that if the decree is void, the commissioner's deed, made by its authority, can pass nothing to the complainant.

"This court disclaims all authority to revise or correct the decree, on the ground of supposed error in the court who pronounced the decree. The principle is too well settled, and too plain to be controverted, that a judgment or decree pronounced by a competent tribunal against a party having actual or constructive notice of the pendency of the suit, is to be regarded by every other co-ordinate tribunal; and that if the judgment or decree be erroneous, the error can be corrected only by a superior appellate tribunal. The leading distinction is between judgments and decrees merely void, and such as are voidable only—the former are binding nowhere, the latter everywhere, until reversed by a superior authority. Upon general principles, the decree of the Washington Circuit Court must have the same force and effect, and none other in this court, than it would or ought to have in any circuit court of the State. Although these principles are unquestionable, the correct application of them to this case is attended with no little difficulty.

"The suit and decree is against the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin. Instead of personal service of process upon the defendants in the suit, an order of publication was made against them; and upon a certificate of the publication of* this order for eight [472 weeks successively in an authorized newspaper being produced and filed in the cause, the bill was taken pro confesso; and at the next succeeding term the final decree was entered, directing the conveyance of the land to the complainant.

"The counsel for the defendants in this cause have suggested several irregularities in the proceedings in that cause; and insist the court had no legal authority to pronounce any decree therein. The complainant's counsel contend that the proceedings were had in pursuance of the several acts of Assembly concerning absent defendants, and that if any irregularities have intervened in the progress of the suit, the proceedings and decree are at most only erroneous; but that the court, having jurisdiction and authority by the laws of the State to pronounce a decree for a conveyance of land lying within the county, the decree, however irregular it may be, is not void.

"This argument renders it necessary to examine the several acts of Assembly authorizing proceedings against absent defendants: for, by the general law of the land, no court is authorized to render a judgment or decree against anyone or his estate, until after due notice by service of process to appear and defend. This principle is dictated by natural justice, and is only to be departed from in cases expressly warranted by law, and excepted out of the general rule.

"The first Act of Assembly is the Act of the 19th of December, 1726, copied from the pre-existing laws of Virginia. That act provides for the case where a suit in chancery is commenced 'against any defendant or defendants, who are out of this commonwealth, and others within the same having in their hands effects of, or otherwise indebted to the absent defendant,' &c.; and the second section authorizes the court, in such cases, to have publication made two months successively in an authorized newspaper, and if the absentee still fails to appear, to proceed to decree, &c. This act manifestly applies only to cases of debt or duties personal, for the satisfaction of which the debts or effects of the absent debtor are attached, or enjoined in the hands of the resident party. The next Act of Assembly, in order of 473*] time, is *the Act of the 16th of December, 1802. The third section of this act provides that 'where any person or persons, their heirs or assigns, claim land as locator, or by bond or other instrument in writing, they may institute a suit in equity, having jurisdiction in such cases; and where the party having died, and the legal title descended to his heirs, the complainant may proceed to obtain a decree for the land, though the particular names of the heirs be unknown and not particularly named in the suit, although they may be residents of this commonwealth or not; but in such cases it shall be advertised eight weeks in one of the gazettes of this State, requiring such heirs or representatives to appear and make defense.' This statute authorizes the court to proceed to decree after publication only in the cases in which the complainant claims the land sued for in his bill as locator only, or by bond or other instrument in writing.

"We must, then, look into the bill of Hollingsworth against the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin, to see if the complainant in that case claimed the land as locator, or by bond or Peters 4.

other instrument in writing. Upon an inspection of the bill it is manifest that the complainant in that case did not claim the land by bond or other instrument in writing. The bill does not pretend that the complainant held, or ever did hold, any instrument of writing; on the contrary, he shows, negatively, that he did not. He alleges that he made a parole agreement with Hamlin for the warrants, after the return of his attachment against Hamlin to the court in Philadelphia, in 1784; and that the warrants were afterwards delivered to him in pursuance of that agreement, by the sheriff, who had seized them at the time he levied the attachment on some of Hamlin's effects, but that the warrants were not returned as levied on. The bill shows he did not claim as locator, in the sense of the term. The claim as locator, and the terms in which it is expressed, are peculiar terms in Kentucky. In early times, many contracts were made between warrant holders and others, by which those others agreed to locate the warrants for a portion of the land secured by location; and in many other cases, one man located the warrants of another without any special agreement as to compensation, *but with an expectation of receiving as compensation the portion of land usually given for such services. The phrase, 'claim as locator,' grew out of this state of things, and has been universally understood by the people of the country to signify the compensation of a portion of the land located and agreed to be given by the owner of the warrant to the locator of it for his services. The term is believed never to have been used in any other sense, or as signifying the acquisition of property by any other species of contract, than a contract to locate for a portion of the land. According to well-settled rules of construction, the language of the statute must be understood in this its popular acceptance.

"The order of publication in the case of Levi Hollingsworth against the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin, was made at the November Term of the Washington Circuit Court, in the year 1813; proof of the publication of the order, eight weeks successively in the Bardstown Repository, was made on the 4th of April, 1814; and at the August Term, in the year 1814, the final decree was rendered in the cause. These dates are important, because they show that the only remaining act upon which reliance was placed, and which passed on the 6th of February, 1815, is subsequent to the decree, and cannot apply to the case. The Acts of 1796 and of 1802, already noticed, were the only statutes existing at the time of the proceedings and decree in the suit of Hollingsworth against the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin, which authorizes the courts of the State to proceed upon orders of publication to decree against absent defendants.

"It appears clear to my mind that the case was not within the provisions of either of the statutes; and that the order of publication, and the proceedings and decree thereupon, were wholly unauthorized and unwarranted by the law of the land. The question is, is the decree therefore erroneously, or is it simply void?

"It seems difficult to escape from the conclusion that if the order of publication was wholly unwarranted by law, the publication is as if it had never been made. Even in cases expressly authorized by the statute, a publication is only a constructive notice to the party; 475*] but if the publication in *the particular case be unauthorized, no principle is perceived upon which it can be regarded as constructive notice.

"It is an acknowledged general principle that judgments and decrees are binding only upon parties and privies. The reason of the rule is founded in the immutable principle of natural justice, that no man's right should be prejudiced by the judgment or decree of a court, without an opportunity of defending the right. This opportunity is afforded (or supposed in law to be afforded) by a citation or notice to appear, actually served; or constructively, by pursuing such means as the law may, in special cases, regard as equivalent to personal service. The course of proceeding in admiralty causes, and some other cases where the proceeding is strictly in rem, may be supposed to be exceptions to this rule.

They are not properly exceptions; the law regards the seizure of the thing as constructive notice to the whole world, and all persons concerned in interest are considered as affected by this constructive notice. But, if these cases do form an exception, the exception is confined to cases of the class already noticed, where the proceeding is strictly and properly in rem, and in which the thing condemned is first seized and taken into the custody of the court. The case under consideration is not properly a proceeding in rem; and a decree in chancery for the conveyance of land has never yet, within my knowledge, been held to come within the principle of proceedings in rem, so far as to dispense with the service of process on the party. There is no seizure nor taking into the custody of the court the land, so as to operate as constructive notice. Constructive notice, therefore, can only exist in the cases coming fairly within the provisions of the statutes authorizing the courts to make orders of publication, and providing that the publication, when made, shall authorize the courts to decree. It has already shown that this case is not within the provisions of any statute.

"It would seem to follow that the court acted without authority, and that the decree is void for want of jurisdiction in the court. But if not void, as being coram non judice, it is void and wholly ineffectual to bind or prejudice 476*] the *rights of Hamlin's heirs, against whom the decree was rendered, because they had no notice, either actual or constructive.

"The principle of the rule that decrees and judgments bind only parties and privies, applies to the case; for though the unknown heirs of Hamlin are affected to be made parties in the bill, there was no service of process, nor any equivalent to bring them before the court, so as to make them, in the eye of the law and justice, parties to the suit.

"The case of Hynes v. Oldham (3 Monroe's Reports) was cited to prove that the proceedings in the case of Hollingsworth v. Hamlin's Heirs were regular; but if not so, that they were at most only erroneous and not void. The cases appear to me to be essentially different. That was a case within the jurisdiction of the statutes authorizing publications; the publication had been made, and the only objection was, that it did not appear that an affidavit had been filed by the complainant that the particular names of the heirs were unknown to him before making the order of publication. It was decided that that omission might have been a cause of revision, or of reversal upon appeal to the appellate court, but that the decree was not therefore void.

"In the case under consideration, the law did not authorize publication at all. It is a case in which the court had no authority to pronounce any decree until the party was served with process. It is not a case like the one cited, where there is an irregularity merely in the manner of issuing or awarding the notice by publication, but a case in which notice by publication is wholly unauthorized. In the case cited, the Court of Appeals admit that a judgment or decree rendered against a party without notice is void, and an unauthorized publication cannot be regarded as notice; and the case under consideration is as if no attempt to give notice had been made.

"There is an obvious distinction in reason between this case and the case where there has been personal service of irregular or erroneous process. In that case the party has notice in part, and may, if he will, appear and object to or waive the irregularity; in this, the publication, being unauthorized, *is not even [*477 constructive notice; and unless the proceedings are considered as void, the injured party may be remediless.

"There is another ground on which it may well be questioned whether the complainant has made out such a case as will enable him to set up and assert the entries, survey and patent of John Abel Hamlin against the defendants. The Act of Assembly of 1802 authorizes a decree upon an order of publication against heirs, where the particular names of the heirs are unknown. But the acts of Assembly do not declare that it shall be taken for granted that there were heirs, and that the title passed by descent to them; and by the decree and commissioners' deed should pass to the complainant, whether any such heirs existed or not. The manifest object of the statute was to dispense with the necessity of inserting the particular names in the proceedings, and to substitute in the stead of the particular names their characteristic description of heirs of the decedent. But it is apprehended the record of the proceedings against the unknown heirs, &c., is no evidence that any such heirs existed, and that the decree and deed, made in pursuance of it, cannot avail to pass any title to the complainant without some evidence that John Abel Hamlin left heirs, upon whom his estate descended, and from whom it could pass by the commissioners' deed to the complainant. There is no evidence in this case conducing in the slightest degree to show that John Abel Hamlin left any heirs capable of inheriting his estate. There is nothing for the complainant to rest upon but presumption. Although it may sometimes be presumed that a decedent left heirs rather than that he left none, it is not clear to my mind that the presumption should be indulged in a case like this, so far as to uphold the title of the complainant. It is but a presumption of fact in any case, and like other presumptions, may be repelled by countervailing facts and presumptions.

"It appears that John Abel Hamlin was a foreigner from France, and died in the city of Philadelphia about the year 1788. The complainant's own bill against the unknown heirs of John Abel Hamlin contains no allegations in terms that he left any heirs capable of inheriting; on the contrary, *it expressly alleges that he left neither wife nor child; and that after much inquiry, no person could be found who could give any account of his heirs. Twenty-five years intervened between the death of John A. Hamlin and the exhibition of the complainant's bill against his unknown heirs in the Washington Circuit Court; and although it appears that he, until his death, and the complainant resided in the city of Philadelphia, and were personally known to each other, no heir ever appeared to claim his estate, nor did Hollingsworth ever ascertain the existence of any such heir. Nearly forty years have transpired since the death of Hamlin, and no heir has yet been heard of. Under such circumstances, if the presumption that Hamlin left heirs is not absolutely repelled, I think it so weakened that the court ought not to rest upon it as sufficient to sustain the complainant's title against the defendants, who have the legal title, and have been long in the possession and enjoyment of it. Even the indulgence of a general presumption that Hamlin left kindred, who, if citizens of the United States or of France, could inherit his estate, would not avail the complainant, without going the full length of presuming also that such kindred were in fact citizens or Frenchmen. The presumption that Hamlin left any kindred, citizens of the United States, is strongly repelled by the statements of Hollingsworth's bill in the Washington Circuit Court, and by all the circumstances of the case. There is nothing to found the presumption upon that he left heirs who were French citizens in 1788, when he died, but the circumstance that he had emigrated from Brittany about, or previous to 1779—a circumstance too feeble to justify this court in finding the fact to be so.

"If Hamlin left kindred who were aliens, and belonging to any other nation, they could take nothing by descent, and nothing could pass from them to the complainant. The objection of the alienage of Hamlin and his heirs, regarding him and them as French citizens or subjects, has not been considered, deeming it unnecessary to express any opinion on that point. Entertaining the opinion, as the foregoing observations have shown, that the complainant has failed to show himself legally inheriting [*479] vested with the claim and *title of John Abel Hamlin, or of his heirs, if he left any, so as to enable him to set up the entries, surveys and patent, in the name of John A. Hamlin against the legal title and long possession of the defendants, all investigation of the relative merits of the original claims is necessarily superseded."

The decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill of the complainant is affirmed, with costs.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, Peters 4.

and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court, that the decree of the said Circuit Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed with costs.

*THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS, Plaintiffs,

v.

THE TOWN OF PAWLET AND OZIAS CLARKE.

Ejectment—effect of pleading to the merits—foreign corporation—Vermont statute of limitation—mesne profits.

Ejectment to recover a lot of land, being the first division lot laid out to the right of the society in the town of Pawlet. The plaintiffs are described in the writ as "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, a corporation duly established in England within the dominions of the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the members of which society are aliens, and subjects of the said king." The defendants pleaded the general issue of not guilty. The general issue admits the competency of the plaintiffs to sue in the corporate capacity in which they have sued.

If the defendants meant to insist on the want of a corporate capacity in the plaintiffs to sue, it should have been insisted upon by a special plea in abatement or bar. Pleading to the merits has been held by this court to be an admission of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue. The general issue admits, not only the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, but to sue in the particular action which they bring.

In the record there is abundant evidence to establish the right of the corporation to hold the land in controversy. It is given to them by the royal charter of 1761, which created the town of Pawlet. The society is named among the grantees as "The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," to whom one share is given. This is a plain recognition by the crown of the existence of the corporation, and of its capacity to take. It would confer the power to take the land, even if it had not previously existed.

The statutes of limitation of Vermont interpose no bar to the institution by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, &c., of an action for the recovery of the land in controversy.

The plaintiffs are a foreign corporation, the members of which are averred to be aliens, and British subjects; and the natural presumption is that they are residents abroad.

The Act of the Legislature of Vermont, which prohibits the recovery of mesne profits in certain cases applies to the claims to such profits by the plaintiffs in this suit, and the provisions of the Treaty of Peace of 1783, and those of the Treaty with Great Britain in 1794, do not interfere with the provisions of that act. The law has prescribed the restrictions under which mesne profits shall be recovered, and these restrictions are obligatory on the citizens of the State. The plaintiffs take the benefit of the statute remedy to recover their right to the land, and they must take the remedy with all the statute restrictions.

THIS cause was certified to this court from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont; the judges of that court being opposed in opinion on certain questions of law which arose at the trial.

The action was an ejectment, brought to recover "the *first division lot laid out [*481

NOTE.—As to mesne profits, and when recoverable, see note to Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1.

to the right of said society in Pawlet, containing fifty acres."

The cause was tried at October Term, 1828, and after the testimony on both sides was closed the jury were discharged upon the disagreement of the judges of the court on the several points herein stated, arising upon the facts agreed in the case, and stated by the counsel for the parties. The facts agreed were:

On the 26th day of August, 1761, George III., then King of Great Britain, by Benning Wentworth, Esq., Governor of the then Province of New Hampshire, made the grant or charter of the town of Pawlet aforesaid, particularly describing the boundaries thereof to the grantees, whose names are entered on said grant, their heirs and assigns forever; to be divided to and among them into sixty-eight shares. Among the grantees whose names are entered in the said charter, is 'one whole share for The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.' A copy of the charter was filed among the proceedings.

And afterwards, on the 16th of April, 1795, Ozias Clarke executed the counterpart of a lease to the selectmen of the town of Pawlet, for the time being, for and on behalf of said town, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, of the tract of land mentioned in the plaintiffs' declaration, described as follows, to wit: all that tract of land situate, lying and being in Pawlet aforesaid, known and distinguished by being the first division fifty-acre lot laid out to the right known by the name of the Society, or Propagation Right, to have and to hold the demised premises, with the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, &c., from the 16th of April, 1795, and onwards as long as trees grow and water runs—his yielding and paying yearly, and at the end of every year, the sum of seven pounds, lawful money, &c. A copy of the lease was annexed and made part of this case. And thereupon Ozias Clarke entered into the immediate possession and occupancy of the said lot of land, and has been ever since in the possession and occupancy of the same; and has paid the rent aforesaid to the town of Pawlet, yearly and every year since, at the rate of seven pounds, 482 equal to twenty-three dollars and thirty-four cents for each year; and the town of Pawlet have received the said sum as rent yearly from Ozias Clarke, and have applied the same for the benefit of schools in the town of Pawlet. And Edward Clarke, the father of Ozias Clarke, went into the possession of the lot in the spring of the year 1780; it not appearing that he had purchased any title thereto, and so continued in the possession thereof till the defendant entered.

The case agreed contains extracts from the minutes of the society, stating the proceedings thereof at their meetings in London relative to the land in Vermont, granted by Governor Wentworth to the society. The first meeting was held on the 16th of July, 1762, and these minutes show the measures adopted by the society relative to the lands from that period down to 1810.

The proceedings on the 16th of July, 1762 and the 16th of March, 1764, show an acceptance of the donation, and a resolution that agents be appointed to take charge of the patents and warrants for the land, and for such other purposes as the interests of the society may require.

At a meeting of the society held December 17th, 1773, the society agreed that it be recommended to the society to empower Mr. Cossitt to see that justice be done to the society in the allotment of glebes, &c., in New Hampshire.

The society resolved to agree that a letter of attorney be sent to the Governor of New Hampshire, empowering Mr. Cossitt to act in behalf of the society with regard to these lands, and leaving blanks for other persons whom the governor may think proper to insert.

On the 20th of May, 1785, a report was made to the society relative to their lands, and the meeting resolved that the secretary do write to some one or more members of the Church of England in each of the States of America in which the society has any property, to take all proper care in securing said property; and further to inform such persons that it is the intention of the society to make over all such property to the use of the Episcopal Church in that country, in whatever manner and form, after communication with the *several 483 governments, shall appear to be most effectual for that purpose.

On the 16th of May, 1794, an application was made to the society through the Bishop of New York, by the Episcopal Convention of Vermont, requesting the society to convey, for the support of the Episcopal Church of that diocese, the land held by the society in Vermont under grants from New Hampshire. The committee of the society made a report as follows:

The committee agreed in opinion that the Bishop of New York be assured of the society's readiness to concur in any measures which can forward the establishment of an Episcopal Church. But having considered that former applications have been made from the State of Vermont, differing in their intentions from the present, which were rejected by the society in May, 1790; and at the same time, Mr. Parker, of Boston, when he obtained a deed from the society for the conveyance of their lands in New Hampshire, had signified that he should not trouble them respecting Vermont till he should know the operation of that deed; and having never since heard from Mr. Parker on that subject, are of the opinion that there is not sufficient ground for the society to execute the present deed.

At a meeting of the society on the 16th of November, 1810, the secretary of the society was directed to obtain the fullest and most particular information respecting the nature and value of the rights of the society to the lands in Vermont, with the best means of recovering and rendering the same available.

In consequence of certain votes of the society expressive of their intention to appropriate the avails of their lands in the State of Vermont for the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in that State, the Convention of the Church in that State made application to the society for the power of attorney: and the said society executed to the Right Rev. Alexander V. Griswold, Bishop of the Eastern Diocese, and the other agents therein named, the power of attorney, dated December 5th, 1816; a copy of which was annexed to the case.

484*] *The Act of the Legislature of Vermont, passed October 27th, 1785, entitled "An Act for settling disputes respecting landed property;" an act entitled "An Act for the purpose of regulating suits respecting landed property, and directing the mode of proceeding therein," passed November 5th, 1800; also the several acts to keep the acts last aforesaid in force for later periods than those contained in said act; an Act passed November 15th, 1820, entitled "An Act for the purpose of regulating suits respecting landed property, and directing the mode of proceeding therein;" and all the statutes ever passed in Vermont, for the limitation of actions, and all the additions thereto, as found in the several statute books, including the Act passed November 16th, 1819, entitled "An Act repealing parts of certain acts therein mentioned," an Act passed October 26th, 1787, authorizing the selectmen of the several towns to improve the glebe and society's lands, and an Act in addition thereto, passed October 26th, 1789; an Act passed October 30th, 1794, entitled "An Act directing the appropriation of the lands in the State, heretofore granted by the British government to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts;" and all other statutes of said State, that either party considers applicable to this case, are to be considered as a part of this case.

Upon the foregoing case, the opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court were opposed upon the following points:

1. Whether the plaintiffs have shown that they have any right to hold lands.

2. Whether the plaintiffs are barred by the three years' limitation in the Act of the 27th of October, 1785, or any other of the statutes of limitation.

3. Whether, under the laws of Vermont, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover mesne profits; and if so, for what length of time.

The case was argued by Mr. Webster for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Doddridge for the defendants. Mr. Doddridge also presented the written argument of Mr. J. C. Wright, for the defendants; as did Mr. Webster an argument for the 485*] *plaintiffs, prepared by the counsel in the Circuit Court of Vermont.

For the plaintiffs, it was argued that it was not a point in issue, or on which the court divided in opinion, whether the plaintiffs were a corporation capable of suing in this form, that being admitted by the plea of the general issue. (Cited, 10 Mod., 207; 1 Bos. & Pull., 10; 10 Co. Rep., 122, 126; 1 Saund. Rep., 340, 342; Atlantic Insurance Company v. Conard, 1 Peters's Rep., 395, 408, 460.)

1. The plaintiffs contend that if they are a corporation capable of suing, they must be capable of taking and holding land.

2. That the right to take and hold lands is incident to a corporation. (Com. Dig., 258, F. 18, 260, F. 18, 19; Co. Lit., 2 a, 2 b; Sid., 162; Co. Rep., 30-36; Sir William Jones' Rep., 168.)

3. That the corporation existed at and prior to the date of the charter of Pawlet, 1761.

It being admitted by the pleadings that the plaintiffs are a corporation, there is no presumption against its prior existence, at any period within the time whereof the memory of man runneth, &c. Its prior existence is matter of general history, of which the court will take notice as matter of law.

The extracts from the records prove the existence of the corporation in 1762, by acts which refer back to the New Hampshire charters, as grants made to the corporation then existing. The preamble of the Act of 1794, under which the defendants claim, recognizes all grants made to the society as made to an existing corporation:

Whereas, The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts is a corporation created by, and existing within a foreign jurisdiction, to which they alone are amenable; by reason whereof, at the time of the late revolution of this and of the United States from the jurisdiction of Great Britain, all lands in this State granted to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts became vested in this State," &c. The lease of the tenant admits that the land in question was granted by said charter to the society. *The New Hampshire charter of the [486 town, of 1761, recognizes the plaintiffs as then being an existing corporation. That charter, being a royal grant, by granting the lands to the plaintiffs, made them a corporation capable of taking and holding the lands thus granted, if they were not so before. (Cited, Dyer, 100, pl. 70; The Aldermen of Chesterfield's case, Cr. Eliz., 35; 10 Mod. Rep., 27, 208.) By the Act of 1794, all grants of land to the society are recognized as grants originally valid, and so continuing until the Revolution; by reason of which, the act declares the lands became vested in this State.

The State claims the right of the society as forfeited to the State, and grants the right to the town; and the tenant, in 1795, acknowledges the right of the town by his lease, &c., and both are in under the act.

The plaintiffs contend that the defendants have admitted the right of the plaintiffs (see Atlantic Insurance Company v. Conard, 1 Peters' Rep., 450), and are estopped from denying the original right of the plaintiffs at any time prior to the Revolution. (Cited, 10 Johns., 353, 358, 292, 223; 12 Johns., 182; 3 Caines, 188; 2 Schf. & Lef. 73, 109.)

The plaintiffs are not barred by the Act of Limitation of 27th October, 1785.

1. The plaintiffs contend that the statute gives no title; that it bars only the action, and not the right of entry; and that the bar has been avoided by entry of the town, and the leases between the defendants.

Clarke, the father of the defendant, entered before the 1st of October, 1780, without color of title, and (without considering the exception to the clause) the action was barred in 1788. In 1795 Clarke permitted the town to enter (which the execution of the lease supposes), accepted a lease from the town (this he acknowledges in the counterpart executed by him, and by the payment of rent), and thereby acknowledged the right of the town.

The statute bars only the remedy therein named. (Bal. on Lim., 59; 2 Salk., 422; Bro. Parl. Cas., 67; Lord Raym. Rep., 741.)

2. The defendants are estopped by their leases from *setting up this defense [487 under this statute. The tenant, by accepting a lease, acknowledges the title of the landlord, and disclaims his own; and the town enter and lease expressly in virtue of their title under the Act of 1794: both parties recognize that as the only existing title.

The case must now rest on the title of the landlord; and he cannot set up this title, as it would show title out of the landlord and in the tenant, which would be repugnant to the effect of the lease. And the tenant can set up no title against his landlord on the ground that he can have no such title. (Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat., 547; 6 Johns. Rep., 34; 1 Caines's Rep., 444; 2 Caines's Rep., 215; 3 Caines's Rep., 188; 2 Camp. Rep., 12, and notes.) The plaintiffs' rights are saved by the ninth section of the act: "provided always, and it is hereby further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act shall not extend to any person or persons settled on lands granted or sequestered for public, pious, or charitable uses."

1. The plaintiffs contend that the words "this act," ex vi termini, extend to the whole act. 2. That the proviso can only be limited by construction; and that statutes of limitations are construed strictly to save the rights of the legal owner, especially an act limiting actions to two years and eight months, without any saving clause in favor of persons beyond seas. The statute 12th of Hen. VIII., c. 2, enacted that formedons in remainder and reverter should be brought within fifty years. It was holden not to extend to formedons in descender. (Co. Lit., 115; Hargrave's Notes, 148.) 3. The restrictive construction would be unreasonable. The effect would be to give the settler no improvements, if sued for public lands on the 30th of June; but would give him the land, together with the improvements, if sued the next day. 4. No inference can be drawn from the location of this section; for if it were conceded that the proviso of the fourth section extended only to the parts of the act relating to improvements, it would furnish no reason why a subsequent section of provisos should not extend to the whole act.

The fourth section is placed in the middle of those respecting improvements, and therefore 488] must apply to what follows, *as well as what precedes it. Besides, it will be found that this section applies to the clause of limitation also.

The counsel then went into a particular examination of the statutes of Vermont on the subject of limitations, and contended that the construction of the whole Act of the 27th of October, 1785, is, that when a person entered into possession of lands of another, to which he had purchased a title, supposing at the time of the purchase such title to be good in fee, he shall be entitled to recover of the owner the value of the improvements and one half of what said lands are risen in value; and shall be quieted in possession of the lands if he remains till after the 1st of July, 1788, without suit against him.

That if he entered without a supposed title, he shall be entitled to recover the value of his improvements; but he shall have no allowance for the rise of the land. But if, by the proviso in the fourth section, he entered after the 1st day of October, 1780, he shall not be entitled to recover for his improvements, nor be protected by the clause of limitation. And if he entered after the 1st day of July without legal title, he could not recover improvements, nor be protected by the clause of limitation.

And if he got possession at any time by actual ouster of the legal owner, according to the fourth section, or had "settled on lands granted or sequestered for public, pious, or charitable uses," or had got the possession of lands by virtue of any contract with the legal owner, according to the ninth section, he could not recover for improvements, nor be protected by the clause of limitations.

He denied that the construction contended for by the defendant was correct.

1. From the history of the act. 2. That it is contrary to the intention of the Legislature, as shown by a particular examination of the laws relative to limitations. 3. From the acts of the Legislature exempting the public rights from the grand list of the State, from which all annual taxes are made up for the support of government, schools, highways, the poor, &c.

*2. The defendants are not protected [489 by the general statute of limitations passed the 10th of March, 1787. This statute has no operation upon any case where the cause of action has accrued before the passing thereof. The words of the statute are: "No act of ejectment, &c., shall hereafter be sued, &c., for the recovery of any lands, &c., where the cause of action shall accrue after the passing of this act; but within fifteen years next after the cause of action shall accrue to the plaintiff or demandant, &c." (Has. Ed. of the Stat., 100, 101.)

But what is very decisive of this question is, that both the general statutes of limitations above referred to contain a proviso in favor of infants, &c., and persons beyond seas. The statutes, therefore, have never commenced running against the plaintiffs in this case, they having always been beyond seas.

The plaintiffs then contend that they are entitled to recover the seisin and possession of the lands, because, 1. The cause of action had accrued before either of the statutes of limitation had passed, and is therefore not with the enacting clauses. 2. If it was, still the right of the plaintiffs is saved under the proviso to protect the lands granted for public, pious, or charitable uses. 3. Because the plaintiffs always have been, and still are, beyond seas.

The plaintiffs are entitled to recover for mesne profits.

At common law, an action of trespass, after recovery in ejectment, was the proper action to recover the mesne profits and such other damages as the plaintiffs had sustained. (Run. on Eject., 156, 157; Bul. N. P., 87; 3 Wil. Rep., 121.) An action for the mesne profits was consequential to the recovery in ejectment. (Aslin v. Parker, 2 Bur. Rep., 668.)

The common law of England was adopted by statute so far as is not repugnant to the constitution, or to any act of the Legislature. (See Has. Ed., 28.) The form of the English action was adopted by statute, and was the only form used till the statute of 1797. (Has. Ed., p. 196.) And upon recovery, the action of trespass was the only action used to recover mesne profits and any other damages: for in the action of trespass, the plaintiff was not confined to the 490*] mesne *profits only; he was entitled to recover for any damages which the defendant had done to the premises—such as cutting timber, or injuring or pulling down buildings, or removing fixtures, &c. Costs in ejectment were recovered as damages in the action of trespass. (2 Bur. Rep., 665.)

The court say that damages may be recovered to four times the amount of the mesne profits. (3 Wils. Rep., 121.)

It remains to inquire for what length of time we are entitled to recover.

1. We contend that as the action itself is within provisos protecting the plaintiffs from the operation of the statutes of limitations, it extends to all the incidents of the action in which the land itself is recovered, and, consequently, will go back to the first entry of the defendant.

2. If not, the plaintiffs are entitled for fifteen years before the commencement of the suit. The action of ejectment generally is limited to fifteen years, and that time in all cases would regulate the other incidents of the action.

The reason why (that at common law there could be no recovery beyond six years) is because the damages must be recovered in an action of trespass, and that action was limited to six years.

The statute of 1797 merely changed the remedy to the form now used. (Comp. L., 84; Toll. Ed., 90, 91.) By this statute the plaintiff is entitled to recover as well his damages, as the seisin and possession of the premises. Under this statute the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the same injuries, and to the same amount, as before the alteration he was entitled to recover in the action of trespass. The first restriction upon such recovery was introduced by a statute passed November 5th, 1800 (Toll. Ed., 211; Comp. L., 176), by the third section of which it is enacted "that in all actions of ejectment which now are, or hereafter may be brought, the plaintiff, &c., shall recover nothing for the mesne profits, except upon such part of said improvements as were made by the plaintiff or plaintiffs, or such person or persons under whom he, she, or they hold." By the fifth section it is provided "that this act shall not extend to any person or persons in 491] possession of any lands granted for *public or pious uses;" and by the eighth section "this act shall not extend to any person or persons who shall enter upon and take possession of lands after the passing of this act."

It follows, therefore, that as the defendants are upon lands appropriated to public, pious, and charitable uses, that they are not entitled to the benefit of this provision of the act. It follows, also, that, as this provision of the act can operate only upon cases that had taken place before the passing of the act, it is wholly retrospective and void. (See 2 Gall. Rep., 139; 7 Johns. Rep., 477.)

Mr. Doddridge, for the defendants, argued:

1. The plaintiffs have shown no capacity to recover these lands, or to hold them. They have offered no evidence of a charter of incorporation, constituting them a body politic, or any act of incorporation authorizing them to institute this suit. This is essential to the commencement of the suit; and the plaintiffs, for Peters 4.

want of such proof of their existence as a corporation, have failed in limine.

The rule of law is that every person, natural or artificial, who would avail himself of a deed or take any benefit by it, must produce the deed itself. (10 Coke, 92, a, b.) And this rule prevails, without exception, in relation to charters or other acts erecting bodies politic. Without such a charter they can have no legal existence. (Page's case, 1 Coke, 52; Rea v. Passmore, 3 Term Rep., 247; 8 Coke, 8; Coke Lit., 225; 8 Johns. Rep., 295; Lord Raym., 1535; Kyd on Corp., 292; Bul. Nisi Prius, 107.)

Before any corporate act can be given in evidence, its charter must be produced. (United States v. Johns, 4 Dall., 412.)

It has been supposed that the existence of the society having become matter of history, it is unnecessary to show the court its corporate character and capacity by producing the act of incorporation.

The distinction between such facts as may or may not be proved by history is well settled. Those which are of *general concern, [492] which affect nations, as the revolutions of governments and the succession of princes, may be proved by history. But the evidence of a private right, as a custom, or of a corporation, which is of much less notoriety than a custom, cannot be so proved. (1 Salk., 281.)

Is it assumed by the plaintiff that the existence of this society as a corporation is acknowledged by the royal grant of the town of Pawlet, made by Governor Wentworth in 1761?

Is it true that a royal grant of land to an indefinite number of individuals, by a general description, is of itself to be received against strangers as evidence of the corporate capacity of the individuals? This court, in Pawlet v. Clarke et al. (9 Cranch, 172), determined such a grant to be void.

The doctrine urged by the plaintiff is conceived to be without authority, and contrary to the whole theory of "king's grants." The king's grants shall not enure to any other intent than that which is precisely expressed in the grant. (2 Bl. Com., 347.)

Is it true that the right to hold lands is legally incident to a corporation? This is denied. A corporation can only act up to the end or design, whatever that may be, for which it was created by the founder. (1 Bl. Com., 480.) Corporations cannot be seized of lands for the use of another. (Bacon on Uses, 347; 1 Bl. Com., 477.) The cases cited for the plaintiffs, of the effect of a grant of lands by the king to a corporation, do not sustain the principle.

It is alleged that the General Assembly of Vermont, by several legislative acts, have recognized all grants made to the society as made to an existing corporation.

None of the acts of the Legislature recognize the right of any foreign company to take or hold land. The interference of the Assembly was for purposes entirely distinct, if not adverse to such recognition.

The acts of Vermont are founded on the supposition that these lands are vacant, and in default of ownership needed the care of the Legislature. Even the last act, which grants the lands to the towns in which they lie for the use of schools, although it mentions them as hav-

493*] ing been granted to "The *Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," does not recite, affirm, or admit the fact of the incorporation of such society; much less its capacity to hold lands in perpetual succession.

But if it had done so, it would have left the question, for every practical purpose, where it found it. The State has no power over any foreign society or body whatsoever.

It is denied that an express declaration by the Legislature that the plaintiffs are a corporation and competent to sue would have any operation. It has been settled in Vermont, on solid grounds, that it is not competent for the Legislature to supply evidence to a party in a particular case. (1 Chip. Rep., 237.) What is legal or pertinent evidence, is a question exclusively for the court to determine.

The Legislature has power to create a corporation; but it has no power to create one within the realm of Great Britain.

Neither the people of Vermont nor the defendants have ever known anything of the society but its name. Nearly seventy years ago the charter of this town of Pawlet, containing the lands sued for, was issued in the name of the king.

The town has been divided among the grantees. The forest has been felled, and the soil made fruitful by its owners. For fifty years the defendant and his ancestors have peaceably possessed this land, now claimed by a supposed body of men of whom nothing is known—men who have never attempted to locate the lands, who never improved it, possessed it, or ever claimed to possess it.

Recently, certain persons in this county, not pretending to be of the society, have required the occupant of the soil, who has so long cultivated and improved the lands, to yield them to a foreign corporation of whose capacity or right they knew nothing, and of which they pertinaciously refuse to exhibit any evidence. May not the validity of a claim so circumstanced be well doubted? Does not the legal suspicion attach to the withholding of the charter that if it was exhibited it would develop circumstances fatal to the claim of the society?

Again, it is insisted that the defendants cannot 494] not require *the production of this charter, because the town of Pawlet has taken possession of this property as having been the property of the society, and so continued until the Revolution; described it as known by the name of "the society right," and now claim it as forfeited by the Revolution.

Where a party resorts to the admissions of his adversary, the whole admission must be taken together. Adopt this rule, and the title of the defendants is indisputable. If it is admitted that the land once belonged to a body corporate, the same statement asserts that it no longer belongs to it, but has been forfeited.

As to a legislative recognition, it cannot avail, if to enact facts for a particular case is contrary to law, and this is certainly so.

If it be said that if the lands were not the property of the society there would be nothing for the statute of Vermont to operate on, the answer is that the words of the statute which refer to "the society land" are descriptive, and no more.

It is not well supposed that the defendants hold or claim to hold under a grant from Vermont. They are in peaceable possession of the land, and have held it for nearly half a century under a legal and a fair title, as they believed; and on this they have a right to rest until a better right shall be made to appear by legal, competent and appropriate testimony.

It is an indispensable rule in ejectment that the plaintiff must entitle himself to recover by the force of his own legal title, and he can derive no support from the weakness of his adversaries.

Evidence of title consists, 1. In showing possession and acts of ownership, from which the legal title may be presumed.

2. In proving a particular title. (2 Stark. on Ev., 514.) He who claims as heir must prove the seisin of his ancestor, and afterward that he is heir. A guardian in socage, who has an interest in the land, must in ejectment prove that his ward is heir; that he is guardian; that his ward is then under the age of fourteen. (2 Stark. on Ev., 521.) These *authorities show [495 the error of the assumption that the defendants, having pleaded the general issue, admitted the right of the plaintiffs to sue as a corporation.

"The general issue," says Sir William Blackstone, "is what traverses and denies at once the whole declaration." (3 Com., 306.) How the denial of the whole can be construed an admission of a part, or any part of the right of the party, is not perceived.

It is agreed that temporary disabilities, which delay the suit only, cannot be relied upon under the general issue. It is only an admission that the party named may sue, not that he has a right to recover what he sues for, either in the way he sues or in any other. His title to recover in all such cases depends on his proof. The nonjoinder of all the parties in interest in a suit is fatal; and yet the principle which is claimed for the plaintiff negatives this well established and proper rule. It is not an answer on the trial to the objection of want of parties, when the evidence of the plaintiff is given, showing that he is not the only party who can claim to recover; that the general issue has been pleaded, and that all such objections have been waived. The spirit of the rule which is claimed in this case should go further to protect a plaintiff showing some right, although not the whole right, than to maintain that one can sue who has shown no right at all.

The case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters, 450), when examined, asserts nothing contrary to the principles which are now stated. In that case, it is said by the distinguished and lamented judge who tried the case at the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, Judge Washington, that the object of the suit "was to try the merits of the case;" and a technical objection taken to defeat the declared purpose of the parties came in under no favor.

If one sues as guardian, executor, or in any fiduciary character, the general issue does not confess his character, and he must prove it. So if an assignee sue, he must, on the general issue, prove the assignment. In this case the plea does not question the right of the plaintiff to sue; but as the plea denies every material allegation in the declaration, it *cannot [496 admit they have title to the thing demanded, or capacity to acquire it, or any matter or thing touching the title.

It is urged that the defendants are estopped by the lease from disputing the capacity of the plaintiffs to take the land. A tenant, it is well said, is estopped to deny the title of his landlord; but the defendants are not tenants to the society. They have shown no title but possession, nor are they bound to exhibit any other, until some title is exhibited by the plaintiffs.

There is no privity of contract, action or interest, or relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant; and the doctrine of estoppels applies to such cases. What privity or relationship exists between the defendants and the pretended corporation? The very fact of capacity (which it is the object of the reasoning of the plaintiffs' counsel to infer or assume) should be proved by proper evidence, before any foundation is laid for inferences. It is required first to assume the corporate capacity of the plaintiff, then the relationship of the defendants to it, to estop the defendants' denial. Such assumptions are not warranted by the law, or by the facts of the case.

If the facts were as the plaintiffs assume, they do not form a legal estoppel and prevent the defendant from a denial of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue for these lands or to hold them.

Every estoppel ought to be reciprocal; that is, to bind both parties. (3 Coke, 352.)

The name given to the land in the lease "known by the name of the society or propagation right," is not the name in which the plaintiffs declare; it may be as well appropriated to one society as to another.

Upon the statutes of limitations it is contended that the plaintiffs are barred of their right of action, should the court consider that they have established a capacity to maintain their suit.

Under the provisions of the Act of 1785 the defendant is fully protected. The record shows that the father of the defendant entered on the 497] land in the spring of 1780, and *continued in possession until April, 1795, when his son entered, and has ever since continued in the possession of the land. It is fairly to be inferred that Ozias Clarke came into possession under his father. And thus a possession of upwards of forty years is made out—a length of possession undisturbed, which entitles the party to the most favorable consideration. On the 10th of March, 1787 the Legislature passed the Quiet- ing Act; which, it is admitted, does not embrace this case; but it is referred to in order to show the existence of a general disposition in the Legislature to impose limitations on all titles derived from the mother country. It was doubtless the intention of the Legislature that the alarm as to titles growing out of the revolutionary struggle should be allayed, and that the holders and occupants of lands so situated should be speedily quieted in their titles, and their titles made complete, under the special legislation growing out of the exigencies of the times. The rights of these parties, we therefore contend, vested under these laws, and no subsequent laws can divest them. The laws thus made constituted a contract on the part of the State; so far, at least, as that the title vested under the laws should not be divested by a repeal or change of the law of limitations.

The plaintiffs contend that the last proviso, Peters 4.

save one, in the Quiet- ing Act, exempts the society from the limitations of the last section.

On the part of the defendants, it is urged that this proviso applies only to the previous part of the law; and by its position, as well as its purpose, is so restricted. Should it have the operation claimed for it by the plaintiffs, it will entirely defeat the purposes of the statute.

The Act of 1795 consists of two distinct and independent parts, the subjects of which bear to each other no affinity or connection; no more than if the legislation upon them was in two distinct laws. A particular examination of the sections of the law fully supports this position.

Sound principles of construction, and the requirements of justice determine, in order to attain the intention of the Legislature, that the two parts of the statute be treated as separate *and distinct; as much so as if con- [498 tained in two statutes.

Separate statutes, or several statutes upon the same subject, are to be considered as one subject, for the purpose of interpretation. (1 Burr., 447.) So if two distinct matters be embraced in one statute, they shall be considered as two acts. (7 Bac. Abr., 551; Hob., 226; Perkins, 13, 14.)

The Act of Limitations of 1785, it is contended, is the only one applicable to the case; and it has no exception in favor of persons "beyond sea." Those words in the law of 1787 have nothing to do with this controversy.

But if they had, this is in the nature of an exception to the statute, and it is to be proved by him who would take advantage of it. That these corporations were beyond sea is not proved, and it is not to be presumed.

This court has determined that to give the court jurisdiction you may look back of the corporation, and must find, in case the jurisdiction is claimed between citizens of different States, that none of the corporators are citizens of the same State with that of the adverse party.

It is contended that the statute of limitations does not apply, because the entry of the defendants, and those under whom they claim, was upon a supposed title. This is denied. The defendant, Clarke, is in possession; and this is all that can be required of him until the plaintiffs have shown their title. The terms of the act clearly embrace the case of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have made out no case of exception. It is understood that the decisions of the courts of Vermont on this statute have always been according to the literal meaning of the law.

It is denied that the Act of 1801, by excepting lands of the description of those claimed by the plaintiffs, reserves the remedy for the recovery of these lands. The argument that no subsequent statute could affect rights acquired under a precedent law has already been submitted, and it is also said with confidence, that the court will not admit that a repeal of the prior law was intended by implication. The Act of 1805 is considered as in full force in Vermont, and many titles depend upon it.

*Are the plaintiffs entitled to recover [499 mesne profits, and for what time?

There is a strong analogy between the limitation of actions for the recovery of the land, and for the recovery of mesne profits. At common law there could be a recovery for a longer period than six years.

In England, where the right to recover for mesne profits was first established, the defendants had probably been, in all the cases, occupants of improved land. In this case the claim of the plaintiffs is for the mesne profits of land which, when first possessed, was in a state of nature, and which has been made productive by the industrious improver. Every principle of justice would require that a claimant under a long dormant title, should not have a compensation for an occupancy which had conferred upon the property such additional value.

In accordance with these principles the Legislature of Vermont have acted, and while on the one hand they have secured to the occupant the value of his improvements, on the other they have denied to the successful claimant any supposed profits of lands, unimproved when the occupation of the defendant commenced. (Act of the Legislature of Vermont, the 15th of November, 1820.)

This action was commenced in 1824, and is clearly within the provisions of this act, and there is nothing in the distinction as to the title under which the defendants held.

It would seem to have been the manifest intention of the Legislature of Vermont, while it denied the occupants without supposed title the value of their improvements, to relieve them from liability for mesne profits; to which, being benefited by the improvements which the party recovering the land takes without compensation, he could have no just claim.

Mr. Webster, in reply:

As to the capacity of the plaintiffs to take and hold the lands. The capacity in which they act is admitted in the pleadings. They sue as a corporation, and they are by the plea of the general issue admitted to be such, and so to 500 be taken. The capacity of the corporation to hold lands is sufficiently proved by producing a grant of lands to it by the king himself. The difference between this case and that of The Town of Pawlet v. Clarke, in 9 Cranch, is that the grant was there to the Church of England, and not to a corporation.

The defendants claim under the Act of 1794, which act admits the existence of the corporation, and of their capacity to take the lands.

The lease to the defendant from the town of Pawlet shows that he claims under the crown. The town claims under the State, and the State claims under the society, and the society hold under the crown. The State assert their right as successors to the society on the occurrence of the Revolution. Thus all parties claim under the crown, and all are bound by their acts.

As to the statute of limitations, he said that the act only barred the action, not the entry; and in 1794 the town of Pawlet actually entered in this very right. They entered as having acquired the right of the society, and holding under it.

The defendant, Clarke, admitted this right; he now holds the lands under it, and he cannot dispute the right, although he may deny that the right belongs to the plaintiffs, and may contend that it has passed to the town.

The defendant cannot set up any title but that under which he entered; and having entered under the town, that title and that alone can he set up; on that title only can he stand.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court; Mr. Justice BALDWIN dissenting on the first point:

This cause is certified to this court from the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, upon certain points upon which the judges of that court were opposed in opinion.

The original action was an ejectment in the nature of a real action, according to the local practice, in which no fictitious persons intervene; and it was brought in May, 1824, to recover a certain lot of land, being the first division lot *laid out to the right of a society [501 in the town of Pawlet. The plaintiffs are described in the writ as "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, a corporation duly established in England, within the dominions of the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the members of which society are aliens and subjects of the said king." The defendants pleaded the general issue, not guilty, which was joined; and the cause was submitted to a jury for trial. By agreement of the parties at the trial, the jury were discharged from giving any verdict, upon the disagreement of the judges upon the points growing out of the facts stated in the record. Those points have been argued before us, and it remains for me to pronounce the decision of the court.

The first point is whether the plaintiffs have shown that they have any right to hold lands.

In considering this point, it is material to observe that no plea in abatement has been filed, denying the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue; and no special plea in abatement, or bar, that there is no such corporation as stated in the writ.¹ The general issue is pleaded, which admits the competency of the plaintiffs to sue in the corporate capacity in which they have sued. If the defendants meant to have insisted upon the want of a corporate capacity in the plaintiffs to sue, it should have been insisted upon by a special plea in abatement or bar. Pleading to the merits has been held by this court to be an admission of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue. (Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, 1 Peters's Rep., 386, 450.)²

But the point here raised is not so much whether the plaintiffs are entitled to sue generally as a corporation, as whether they have shown a right to hold lands. The general issue admits not only the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, *but to sue in the particular [502 action which they bring. But in the present case, we think, there is abundant evidence in the record to establish the right of the corporation to hold the lands in controversy. In the first place, it is given to them by the royal charter of 1761, which created the town of Pawlet. Among the grantees therein named is "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," to whom one share in the township is given. This is a plain recognition by the crown of the existence of the corporation, and of its capacity to take. It would confer the power to take the lands, even if it had not previously existed. And the other proceedings stated on the record, establish the fact that the society had received various other donations from the crown of the same nature, and had accepted them. Besides, the Act of 1794, under which the town of Pawlet claims the lands, distinctly admits the existence of the corporation, and its capacity to take the very land in controversy.

"Whereas," says the act, "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts is a corporation created by and existing within a foreign jurisdiction, to which they alone are amenable; by reason whereof, at the time of the late revolution of this and of the United States from the jurisdiction of Great Britain, all lands in this State, granted to The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, became vested in this State," &c.

And the act then proceeds to grant the right of the State, so vested in them, to the various towns in which they are situated. So that the title set up by the State is under the society, as a corporation originally capable to take the lands, and actually taking them; and their title being divested, and vesting in the State by the Revolution. In the latter particular the Legislature were mistaken in point of law. This court had occasion to decide that question in The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts v. The Town of New Haven (8 Wheat., 464); where it was held that the Revolution did not divest the title of the society, although it was a foreign corporation. That case came before us upon a special verdict, which found the original charter of the society 503] granted by William III., and *its power to hold lands, &c. We do not, however, rely on that finding, as it is not incorporated into the present case. But we think the other circumstances sufficient, prima facie, to establish the right of the society as a corporation to hold lands; and particularly the lands in question. In Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters's Rep., 386, 450), the court held evidence far less direct and satisfactory, prima facie evidence of the corporate character of the plaintiffs. A certificate ought accordingly to be sent to the Circuit Court in answer to the first question; that the plaintiffs have shown that they have a right to hold the lands in controversy.

The second point is, whether the plaintiffs are barred by the three years' limitation in the Act of the 27th of October, 1783, or any other statute of limitations of Vermont.

The Act of 1785 recites in the preamble that many persons have purchased supposed titles to lands within the State, and have taken possession and made large improvements, &c. It then proceeds to provide in the first eight sections for the allowance of improvements, &c., to the tenants, in cases of eviction under superior titles. There is a proviso which prevents these sections from extending to anything future. The ninth section is as follows: "Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act shall not extend to any person or persons settled on lands granted or sequestered for public, pious, or charitable uses; nor to any person who has got possession of lands by virtue of any contract made between him and the legal owner or owners thereof." The tenth section provides that nothing in the act shall be construed to deprive any person of his remedy at law against his voucher. The eleventh and last section is as follows: "That no writ of right or other real action, no action of ejectment or other possessory action of any name or nature soever, shall be sued, prosecuted or maintained for the recovery of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, where the cause of action has accrued before the passing of this act; unless such action be commenced within three years next after the 1st of July in the present year of our Lord, 1788."

*Now, in order to avail themselves [504 of the statute bar under this last section, it is necessary for the defendants to show that the cause of action of the plaintiffs accrued before the passing of that act. To establish that, it is necessary to show that there had been an actual ouster of the plaintiffs by some person entering into possession adversely to the plaintiffs. No such ouster is shown upon the facts. It is, indeed, stated "that Edward Clarke, the father of the said Ozias Clarke, went into possession of the said lot in the spring of the year 1780, it not appearing that he had purchased any title thereto; and so continued in possession thereof until the said defendant entered as aforesaid;" that is, under the lease of the town. Edward Clarke is, therefore, to be treated as a mere intruder, without title; and no ouster can be presumed in favor of such a naked possession. And it is not unworthy of notice that the fourth section of the Act of 1785 provided "that no person, who hath ousted the rightful owner, or got possession of any improved estate by ouster, otherwise than by legal process, shall take any advantage or benefit by this act." So that a plain intention appears on the part of the Legislature not to give its protection to mere intruders who designedly ousted the rightful owners.

It is also to be considered that the defendants do not assert any claim of title under him or in connection with him; and the other circumstances of the case lead to the presumption that he never set up any possession adverse to the society's rights; for the possession was yielded without objection to the town when the Act of 1794 enabled the town to assert a title to it.

The Act of 1785, being then in terms applicable only to cases where the cause of action accrued before the passing of that act, cannot govern this case where no such cause existed. There is, moreover, another difficulty in setting it up as a bar, if the proviso of the ninth section extends, as we think it does, to every section of the act. It has been argued by the counsel for the defendants that the ninth section ought to be restricted in its operation to the eight preceding sections. But we see no sufficient reason for this. The words are "that this act shall not extend," &c.; not *that [505 the prior section of this act shall not extend, &c. It would be strange, indeed, if the Legislature should interfere to prevent any improvements being paid for in cases of lands granted or sequestered for public, pious, or charitable uses; and yet should allow so short a period as three years to bar, forever, the right of the grantees for charity. There are good grounds why statutes of limitation should not be applied against grants for public, pious, and charitable uses, when they may well be applied against mere private rights. The public have a deep and permanent interest in such charities; and that interest far outweighs all considerations of mere private convenience. The Legislature of Vermont has thought so; for we shall find, in its subsequent legislation, that it has by a similar provision excepted from the operation of all the subsequent statutes of limitation, grants to such uses. There is, then, no reason why the court should construe the words of the ninth section as less extensive than their literal import. The ease ought to be very strong which would justify any court to depart from the terms of an act, and especially to adopt a restrictive construction which is subversive of public rights, and justified by no known policy of the Legislature. We feel compelled, therefore, to construe the words, that "this act shall not extend, &c.," as embracing the whole act, and carving an exception out of the operation of the eleventh section of it.

Let us then see how far any subsequent statute of limitations of the State applies to the ease. The next statute in the order of time is the Act of the 10th of March, 1787, which provided as follows: "That no writ of right or other real action, no action of ejectment, &c.," shall "hereafter be sued, &c., for the recovery of any lands &c., where the cause of action shall accrue after the passing of this act, but within fifteen years next after the cause of action shall accrue to the plaintiff or demandant, and those under whom he or they may claim. And that no person having a right of entry into any lands, &c., shall hereafter thereinto enter but within fifteen years after such right of entry shall accrue." This act contained no provision excepting grants for public, pious, or charitable uses from its operation. But it contained a 506 proviso that the act should not extend to bar any infant, person imprisoned, or beyond seas, without any of the United States. The act was prospective, and applied only where the cause of action accrued after the passing of it. This act was superseded and repealed by another Act of the 10th of November, 1797, which constitutes the present governing statute of limitations of the State. It contains, however, a proviso (see. 13) that the act shall not be construed to extend to or affect any right or rights, action or actions, remedies, fines, forfeitures, privileges, or advantages, accruing under any former act or acts, clause or clauses of acts falling within the construction of that act, in any manner whatsoever; but that all proceedings may be had, and advantages taken thereon, in the same manner as though that act had not been passed; and that the former act or acts of limitation, clause or clauses of acts, which are or were in force at the time of passing the act, shall, for all such purposes, be and remain in full force. This proviso preserved the operation and force of the Act of 1787, as to causes of action accruing in the intermediate period between the Act of 1787 and the Act of 1797.

In this view of the matter, it is important to consider the entry of the defendant under the lease of the town, on the 16th of April, 1795. If that entry was adverse to the title of the plaintiffs, then the Act of 1787 began to run upon it from that period; for the cause of action of the plaintiffs then accrued to them by the ouster.

It has been contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that the entry of Clarke under the lease in 1795 was an entry for the plaintiffs, and in virtue of their title, and not adverse to it. We do not think so. The town of Pawlet claimed the right to the property, not as tenants to, or subordinate to the right of the plaintiffs, but as grantees under the State. Their title, though derivative from, and consistent with the original title of the plaintiffs, was a present claim in exclusion of, and adverse to the plaintiffs. They claimed the possession, as their own, in fee-simple; and not as the possession of the plaintiffs. A vendee in fee derives his title from the vendor; but his title, though derivative, is adverse to that of the vendor. [507 He enters and holds possession for himself, and not for the vendor. Such was the doctrine of this court in Blight's Lessee v. Rochester. (7 Wheat. Rep., 535, 547, 548.) The lessee in the present case did not enter to maintain the right of the plaintiffs, but of the town. He was not the lessee of the plaintiffs, and acquired no possession by their consent, or with their privity. This entry, then, was adverse to any subsisting title in them, and with an intention to exclude it. It was, therefore, in every just sense, an entry adverse to, and not under the plaintiffs.

The case then falls within the Act of 1787; and unless the plaintiffs are "beyond seas" within the proviso of that act, they would, upon the mere terms of that act, be barred. The facts stated upon the record do not enable us to say whether there is absolute proof to that effect. The plaintiffs are a foreign corporation, the members of which are averred to be aliens and British subjects; and the natural presumption is, that they are resident abroad. If so, there cannot be a doubt that they are within the exception. If any of the incorporators were resident in the United States, then a nearer question might arise as to the effect of the proviso: whether it applied to the corporation itself, or to the incorporators, as representing the corporation. But this it is unnecessary to devise, and on this we give no opinion.

There is the less reason for it, because, by a subsequent Act, passed on the 11th of November, 1802 (long before the fifteen years under the Act of 1787 had run), it was provided "that nothing contained in any statute of limitations heretofore passed shall be construed to extend to any lands granted, given, sequestered or appropriated to any public, pious, or charitable uses; or to any lands belonging to this State. And any proper action of ejectment or other possessory action may be commenced, prosecuted, or defended for the recovery of any such land or lands, anything in any act or statute of limitations heretofore passed to the contrary notwithstanding." This act of course suspended the Act of 1787 as to all cases within its purview. That the grants to the society for the propagation of the gospel were deemed to be grants for pious and charitable uses within it, 508*] is apparent *from the subsequent legislation of the State, as well as from the objects of the institution. In November, 1819, the Legislature passed an Act repealing this exception, so far as related to the rights "of lands in the State granted to The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," thus plainly declaring that they were previously protected by it. This repeal cannot have any retrospective operation, as to let in the general operation of the statute of limitations in the intermediate period between 1802 and 1819; but must upon principle be held to revive the statute only in future. The present suit was brought in 1824, and the statute period of fifteen years had not then run against the plaintiffs.

It is unnecessary to enter upon the consideration of the statute of limitations of 1797, which contains similar provisions as to this subject with that of 1787, and the exception of persons "beyond seas." Charitable and pious grants were not excepted from its operation: but that defect was cured by an Act passed on the 26th of October, 1801, in terms similar in substance to those of the Act of 1802, already referred to. The Act of 1797 applies in terms only to future causes of action, to causes of action accruing after the passing of the act; and limits the action to the period of fifteen years. If it had applied to the present case, it would have been open to the same reasoning upon the exceptions which have been already suggested in reference to the Act of 1787.

Upon this second question our opinion is that a certificate ought to be sent to the Circuit Court that the plaintiffs are not barred by the three years' limitation, in the Act of the 27th of October, 1785, or by any other of the statutes of limitations of Vermont.

The next point is, whether, under the laws of Vermont, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover mesne profits; and if so, for what length of time.

Previous to the year 1797, the English action of ejectment was in use in Vermont, and the common law applicable to it, as well as the action for mesne profits consequential upon recovery in ejectment. By an Act passed on the 2d of March, 1797, the mode of proceeding 509] was altered. *The suit was required to be brought directly between the real parties, and against both landlords and tenants; and by that and a subsequent act, the judgment was made conclusive between the parties. It was further provided that in every such action, if judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff, he should recover as well his damages as the scisin and possession of the premises. This provision has ever since remained in full force, and has superseded in such cases the action for mesne profits. In November, 1800, an Act was passed declaring, "that in all actions of ejectment which now are, or hereafter may be brought, the plaintiff shall recover nothing for the mesne profits, except upon such part of said improvements as were made by the plaintiff, or plaintiffs, or such person or persons under whom he, she, or they hold." The act contained a proviso that it should not extend to any person or persons in possession of any lands granted for public or pious uses. This act continued in force until November, 1820, when an Act passed containing the same general provision as to the mesne profits; but the proviso in favor of lands granted to pious and charitable uses was silently dropped, and must be deemed to be repealed by implication.

The question, then, is, whether the Act of 1820 does not take away the right to mesne profits in this case; for the state of facts does not show that any improvements have ever been made by the plaintiffs. The Treaty of Peace of 1783, the British Treaty of 1794, do not apply to the case. The right of action, if any, of the plaintiffs, did not accrue until the year 1795. The entry then made by the defendants was the first ouster; and at that time, in the action of ejectment, the plaintiffs could not have recovered any damages; but would have been driven to an action of trespass for mesne profits. The Legislature was competent to regulate the remedy by ejectment, and to limit its operation. It has so limited it. It has taken away by implication the right to recover mesne profits, as consequential upon the recovery in ejectment, and given the party his damages in the latter action. It has prescribed the restrictions upon which mesne profits shall be recovered, and these restrictions are obligatory *upon the citizens of the State. [510 The plaintiffs have not, in this particular, any privileges by treaty beyond those of citizens. They take the benefit of the statute remedy to recover their right to the lands; and they must take the remedy with all the statute restrictions.

Upon this last question our opinion is that it ought to be certified to the Circuit Court, that under the laws of Vermont the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any mesne profits; unless so far as they can bring their case within the provisions of the third section of the Act of the 15th of November, 1820.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont, and on the points or questions on which the judges of the said Circuit Court were opposed in opinion, and which points or questions were certified to this court for its opinion, in pursuance of the act of Congress for that purpose made and provided, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered by this court that it be certified to the said Circuit Court on the points aforesaid, that this court is of opinion, 1. That the plaintiffs have shown that they have a right to hold lands, and especially the lands in controversy. 2. That the plaintiffs are not barred by the three years' limitation in the Act of the 27th of October, 1785, or by any other of the statutes of limitations of Vermont. And, 3. That under the laws of Vermont, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any mesne profits, unless so far as they can bring their case within the provisions of the third section of the Act of Vermont of the 15th of November, 1820. All of which is accordingly hereby certified to the said Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont.

511*] *JULIE SOULARD, Widow, ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

JOHN T. SMITH, Appellant,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

Louisiana treaty—what is property in lands.

In the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, the United States stipulated that the inhabitants of the ceded territory should be protected in the free enjoyment of their property. The United States, as a just nation, regard this stipulation as the avowal of a principle which would have been held equally sacred, though it had not been inserted in the contract.

The term "property," as applied to lands, comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete. It is supposed to embrace those rights which lie in contract, those which are executory, as well as those which are executed. In this respect the relations of the inhabitants of Louisiana to their government is not changed. The new government takes the place of that which has passed away.

THESE cases came before the court on appeals from the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

In the District Court of Missouri, the appellants, under the Act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824, instituted proceedings to try the validity of their claims to certain lands in Missouri, the titles to which they claimed to derive under the former Spanish government.

The District Court gave a decree against the claimants.

The cases were argued by Mr. Benton for the appellants, and by Mr. Wirt for the United States.

The facts of the cases and the arguments of the counsel are not reported, as the court held the causes under advisement.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL stated:

The court have held the two cases of Souldard and John T. Smith against the United States under advisement. After bestowing upon them the most deliberate attention, we are unable to form a judgment which would be satisfactory to ourselves, or which ought to satisfy the public.

In the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, the United States stipulated that the inhabitants of the ceded territory should be protected in the free enjoyment of their property. The United States, as a just nation, regard this stipulation as the avowal of a principle which would have been held equally sacred, though it had not been inserted in the contract.

The term "property," as applied to lands, comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete. It is supposed to embrace those rights which lie in contract—those which are executory as well as those which are executed. In this respect the relation of the inhabitants to their government is not changed. The new government takes the place of that which has passed away.

In the full confidence that this is the sentiment by which the government of the United States is animated, and which has been infused into its legislation, the court have sought sedulously for that information which would enable it to discern the actual rights of the parties, and to distinguish between claims founded on legitimate contracts with those authorized to make them on the part of the crown, or its immediate agents, and such as were entirely dependent on the mere pleasure of those who might be in power such as might be rejected without giving just cause of imputation against the faith of those in office. The search has been unavailing.

When Louisiana was transferred to the United States very few titles to lands, in the upper part of that province especially, were complete. The practice seems to have prevailed for the deputy-governor, sometimes the commandants of posts, to place individuals in possession of small tracts, and to protect that possession without further proceeding. Any intrusion upon this possession produced a complaint to the immediate supervising officer of the district or post, who inquired into it, and adjusted the dispute. The people seem to have remained contented with this condition. The colonial government, for some time previous to the cession, appears to have been without funds, and to have been in the habit of remunerating services with land instead of money. Many of these concessions remained incomplete.

*If the duty of deciding on these various titles is transferred by the government to the judicial department, the laws and principles on which they depend ought to be supplied. The edicts of the preceding governments in relation to the ceded territory; the powers given to the governors, whether expressed in their commissions, or in special instruction; and the powers conferred on and exercised by the deputy-governors and other inferior officers who may have been authorized to allow the inception of title, are all material to a correct decision of the cases now before the court, and which may come before it. We cannot doubt the disposition of the government to furnish this information if it be attainable. We are far from being confident that it is attainable, but have determined to hold the cases which have been argued under advisement until the next term, in the hope that in the meantime we may be relieved from the necessity of deciding conjecturally on interests of great importance.

The Chief Justice added: Since the determination which has been communicated had been agreed upon, the court has been informed that the Edict of August the 24th, 1770, is in the office of the Secretary of State.

Had that edict been sufficient for the decision of the court, they would have disposed of the cases at this term. But other information is required, which has been referred to in the opinion. It is therefore considered proper to hold the cases under advisement.

514*] THE PROVIDENCE BANK, Plaintiffs in Error,
v.

ALPHEUS BILLINGS AND THOMAS G. PITTMAN.

Charter of bank by a State—contracts between a State and individuals—State power of taxation, relinquishment of not to be presumed—incorporation in general—State legislation.

In 1791 the Legislature of Rhode Island granted a charter of incorporation to certain individuals who had associated for the purpose of banking. They were incorporated by the name of the president, directors, and company of the Providence Bank, with the ordinary powers of such associations. In 1822 the Legislature passed an act imposing a tax on every bank in the State except the Bank of the United States. The Providence Bank refused the payment of the tax, alleging that the act which imposed it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, as it impaired the obligation of the contract created by the charter of incorporation. Held, that the Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island, imposing a tax, which, under the law, was assessed on the Providence Bank, does not impair the obligation of the contract created by the charter granted to the bank.

It has been settled that a contract entered into between a State and an individual is as fully protected by the prohibitions contained in the tenth section, first article of the Constitution, as a contract between two individuals; and it is not denied that a charter incorporating a bank is a contract.

The power of taxing moneyed corporations has been frequently exercised, and has never before, so far as is known, been resisted. Its novelty, however, furnishes no conclusive argument against it.

That the taxing power is of vital importance, that it is essential to the existence of government, are truths which it cannot be necessary to reaffirm. They are acknowledged and asserted by all. It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed. We will not say that a State may not relinquish it; that a consideration sufficiently valuable to induce a partial release of it may not exist; but as the whole community is interested in retaining it undiminished, that community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon it does not appear.

The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collected and changing body of men. Any privileges which may exempt it from the burdens common to individuals do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist.

The power of legislation, and consequently of taxation, operates on all persons and property belonging to the body politic. This is an original principle, which has its foundation in society itself. It is granted by all, for the benefit of all. It resides in government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved where property of any description, or the right to use it in any manner, is granted to individuals or corporate bodies.

However absolute the right of an individual may be, it is still in the nature of that right that it must bear a portion of the public burdens, and that portion must be determined by the Legislature. This vital power may be abused, but the Constitution of the United States was not intended to furnish the correction *of every abuse of [*515 power which may be committed to the State governments. The intrinsic wisdom and justice of the representative body and its relations with its constituents, furnish the only security where there is no express contract, against unjust and excessive taxation, as well as against unwise legislation generally.

THIS was a writ of error to the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of Rhode Island, and the question which was presented for the consideration of the court was the constitutionality of an Act passed by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, in January, 1822, entitled "An Act imposing a duty upon licensed persons and others, and bodies corporate within this State;" alleged to be a violation of the contract contained in the charter of the bank. Under the provisions of this act, and in conformity with them, a tax was imposed on the Providence Bank; and the bank having refused payment thereof, a seizure was made for the amount of the tax in the banking house, by Alpheus Billings, the sheriff of the County of Providence, and by Mr. Pittman, the general treasurer of the State of Rhode Island. The bank instituted an action of trespass for this taking against the sheriff and the treasurer in the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Providence; to which action the defendants pleaded in their defense the act im-

NOTE.—Taxation of stock of, or shares in, corporation, does not impair obligation of contracts—taxation of shares in National banks, and of other corporations.

The power of a sovereign government to impose taxes extends to all the persons and property belonging to the body politic, and has its foundation in the nature of society itself. It is granted by all for the benefit of all, and resides in the government as part of itself. Charles River Bridge v. Wanar Bridge, 11 Pet., 420, 546, 547.

The taxing power of a State is one of its attributes of sovereignty. And where there has been no compact with the federal government, or cession of jurisdiction for the purposes specified in the Constitution, this power reaches all the property and business within the State, which are not properly denominated the means of the general government, and may be exercised at the discretion of the State. Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How., 73.

Property of every description, under the jurisdiction of a State, is subject to taxation, except the stock of the United States held by its citizens. Carroll v. Perry, 4 McLean, 25.

A tax laid by a State on banks, on a valuation equal to the amount of their capital stock, is a tax on the property of the institution; and when that property consists of stocks of the United States, the law laying the tax is void. Bank Tax Case, 2 Wall., 200.

The Act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. at L., 99), "to provide a national currency," &c., subjects the shares of the banking associations authorized by it, and in the hands of shareholders, to taxation by the States, under certain limitations (set forth Peters 4.

in sec. 41), without regard to the fact that a part of the whole of the capital of such association is vested in national securities declared by the statutes authorizing them to be "exempt from taxation by or under State authority." Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall., 573; People v. The Commissioners, 4 Wall., 244.

The act thus construed is constitutional. Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall., 573.

An Act of a State Legislature imposing taxes on the shares of stock owned in national banking institutions, which omitted to provide, according to sec. 41 of the Act to provide for a national currency, that such taxes should not exceed the rate imposed on shares of banks organized under the State authority, is unconstitutional; it appearing that, under the State legislation, no tax was laid on the shares of State banks, although there was a tax on the capital of such banks. Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall., 573; Bradley v. The People, 4 Wall., 459.

No greater proportion or percentage of tax on the valuation of shares held by an individual in a national bank can be assessed by a State than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. 13 Stat. at L., 99; People v. Commissioners, 4 Wall., 244.

Where a State Legislature has, by contract relinquished its power of taxation with reference to the property of a banking corporation, a subsequent law which violates this contract by an imposition of taxes, is unconstitutional and void. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436; Franklin Branch Bank v. Ohio, 1 Black, 474.

A provision of a State constitution authorizing posing the tax, and the amendments thereto; and that in pursuance of the provision of the same a warrant was issued, and the proceedings which were the subject of the action were done.

To this plea the bank filed a general and a special demurrer. Among the causes of demurrer, the repugnancy of the acts of the General Assembly imposing the tax to the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as they violate the contract set forth in the declaration (the act incorporating the bank), and, inasmuch as they authorize private property to be taken for public purpose, without providing any compensation, are distinctly stated.

A judgment against them was submitted to by the bank in the Court of Common Pleas; and they appealed to the Supreme Judicial Court, where the judgment of the inferior court was confirmed by submission on the part of the 516] bank,*and they prosecuted this writ of error, under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

The Providence Bank was chartered by the Legislature of Rhode Island in October, 1791. The preamble of the act states:

"Whereas, the president and directors of a bank established at Providence, on the 3d of October last, have petitioned this General Assembly for an act to incorporate the stockholders in said bank; and whereas, well regulated banks have proved very beneficial in several of the United States, as well as in Europe: therefore, be it enacted by the General Assembly, and by the authority thereof it is hereby enacted, that the stockholders in said bank, their successors and assigns, shall be, and are hereby created and made a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of the President, Directors and Company of the Providence Bank, and by that name shall be, and are hereby made able and capable in law, to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain to them and their successors, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects of what kind or nature soever, and the same to sell, grant, devise, alien or dispose of, to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record, or any other place whatsoever; and also to make, have and use a common seal, and the same to break, alter and renew at their pleasure, and also to ordain, establish and put in execution such by-laws, ordinances and regulations, as shall seem necessary and convenient for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to law, or the constitution of said bank, and generally to do and execute all and singular acts, matters and things, which to them it shall or may appertain to do.

"And whereas, the stockholders, on the said 3d day of October, formed and adopted a constitution for said bank, in the words following, viz.:

"Taught by the experience of Europe and America that well regulated banks are highly useful to society by promoting punctuality in the performance of contracts, increasing the medium of trade, facilitating the payment of taxes, *preventing the exportation of [517 specie, furnishing for it a safe deposit, and by discounts rendering easy and expeditious the anticipations of funds on lawful interest, advancing at the same time the interest of the proprietors; we, the subscribers, desirous of promoting such an institution, do hereby engage to take the number of shares set against our names respectively, in a bank to be established in Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, on the following plan." &c.

The plan of the association is set forth in the act, and is made a part of the charter. It provides for the opening of subscriptions for the stock of the bank, to consist of six hundred and twenty-five shares of four hundred dollars each, making a capital of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and for the organization of the bank. The act gives to the corporation the usual powers necessary to carry into effect taxes to be imposed on banks, cannot be applied to a bank which received its charter before the adoption of such constitution, in such way as to impose on the bank a higher tax than is stipulated in the charter. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436.

Where the charter of a bank, incorporated by a State, provides that no more than a specified amount of taxes shall be levied on its property, the Legislature of the State has not power subsequently to pass a law impairing the obligation of such contract. Ohio Life & Trust Co. v. DeBolt, 16 How., 416.

The constitutional prohibition upon State laws impairing the obligation of contracts restricts the State from passing laws to impose taxes which will violate existing contracts. Murray v. Charleston, 6 Otto, 432.

It does not forbid a subsequent Legislature from imposing a tax on a corporation, merely because a prior Legislature assumed to give the corporation an exemption which it had not power to confer in perpetuity. Railroad Companies v. Gaines, 7 Otto, 697.

Shares of Stock in a national bank, in New York State, should be assessed for taxation, at their true value, notwithstanding that may be more than their par value. People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 4 Otto, 415; see St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Papin, 4 Dill., 29.

But should only be assessed at the same percentage, or in the same proportion as other property; and where they were assessed at their full value, while other property was only assessed at 30 or 40 per cent. of its true value, the bank was allowed to maintain an action to restrain collection of the tax beyond a fair share. Merchants' Bank of Toledo v. Cumming, 17 Alb. L. J., 345; 5 Reporter, 680; City National Bank of Paduech v. Paduech, 5 Cent. L. J., 347.

As to power and extent, of taxation of shares of National banks and corporations. See further Tappan v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 19 Wall., 490; National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall., 353; Waite v. Dowley, 4 Otto, 327; Adams v. Nashville, 5 Otto, 19; Hepburn v. The School Districts, 23 Wall., 480; National Bank of Hamden v. Pierce, 18 Alb. L. J., 16; 5 Law & Eq. Northern Central Railway*, Chase Dec., 268; Morgan v. Louisiana, 3 Otto, 217; Union National Bank v. Chicago, 3 Biss., 82.

The capital stock, franchises, and all the real and personal property of corporations are justly liable to taxation. Rule of valuation of capital stock and franchise. State Railroad Tax Cases, 2 Otto, 575; Huntington v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 2 Sawyer, 503; St. Louis National Bank v. Papin, 22 Int. Rev. An Act of the Legislature exempting property of a Railroad from taxation is not a "contract" to exempt it, unless there be a consideration for the act. An agreement where there is no consideration is a nude pact; the promise of a gratuity which may be kept changed or recalled, at pleasure. West Wisconsin R. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 Otto, 595.

the objects of its formation, and makes provisions for the transaction of the business of the company. Amendments to this act were afterwards passed by the Legislature.

The case was argued by Mr. Whipple for the plaintiffs in error, and by Mr. Hazzard and Mr. Jones for the defendants.

Mr. Whipple, for the plaintiffs in error, said: as this case involves constitutional principles of great delicacy and importance, it may be not useless to advert to the principles established by this court.

At no period in the political or civil history of England or of this country, has it been admitted that the Legislature possessed unlimited or absolute power. Under the British government, the rights of private property were respected, long antecedent to emigration to this country; although violence to the political rights of the subjects of the crown are frequently recorded in history. The immunities of private property, and the inviolability of vested rights, have been asserted by political and legal writers, and established by judicial decisions for three centuries past.

The assertion of a limit to legislative authority was constant during the colonial existence of this country; and the principle was afterwards inserted in the bills of rights and in the constitutions of States. At a very early period 518 after the establishment of the government of the United States, it became necessary to give to these received opinions the sanction of judicial authority; and this was done by this court in 1798, in the case of Calder v. Bull. (3 Dall. Rep., 386; 1 Condensed Rep., 172). The principles of that case, so far as they declare the obligation of a contract to be superior to the power of the Legislature, were re-asserted in Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch's Rep., 88). Again these principles were maintained in the cases of The State of New Jersey v. Wilson (7 Cranch, 104); Terrett v. Taylor (9 Cranch, 43); The Town of Pawlet v. Clarke et al. (9 Cranch, 202); Sturges v. Crowninshield (4 Wheat., 122); McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316); The Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 Wheat., 518); Weston v. The City Council of Charleston (2 Peters, 450).

The cases which have the strongest bearing, and which are thought to decide the present case, are Fletcher v. Peck, McCulloch's case, the Dartmouth College case, and the case of The City Council of Charleston. Fletcher v. Peck establishes the principle that a State cannot invalidate its own grant; that in making a grant it acts as a party, and is bound as a party, "Every grant (say the court) is, in its own nature, an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies an obligation not to re-assert that right."

The Dartmouth College case puts an end to all discussion of the question whether a charter is a contract, and whether the public benefit derived from them is not a sufficient consideration. The language of the courts is so full and clear upon those points, that it is believed that no doubt will be entertained upon them.

Mr. Whipple then went into a particular examination of the case. He said the bank was incorporated in 1791 with the usual powers of a corporation. The motives of the Legislature in granting the charter, which was the legal consideration of the grant, are declared in these terms:

"Taught by the experience of Europe and America that well regulated banks are highly useful to society by promoting punctuality in the performance of contracts, increasing the medium of trade, facilitating the payment of taxes, *preventing the exportation of [519 specie, furnishing for it a safe deposit, and by discounts rendering easy and expeditious the anticipations of funds on lawful interest, advancing at the same time the interest of the proprietors," &c.

The first and seventh sections of the charter evidently contemplate the ownership of property by the bank in its corporate capacity. The real estate and the profits of the capital stock, previous to a dividend, may be considered as belonging to the bank. But the capital stock itself is as much the property of a stranger as of the bank. There cannot well be two entire owners to the same property. The stockholders have the property, and the corporation the management of it. The corporation is not even the trustee, for it has not the legal estate, and no power to sell. It has merely the naked possession, with the perpetual legal right of using the funds for the benefit of the legal and equitable owners.

The stock was subscribed for at a very early period, and the bank went into successful operation. The capital was subsequently increased to five hundred thousand dollars. For many years past the shares have sold from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. advance, owing, in part, to the belief that the charter was perpetual, and that the Legislature had no power over it. No power to repeal or to modify, by subsequent law, was reserved, and none was believed to exist until January, 1822.

Most of the present owners purchased their stock at an advance, a part of which will be lost to them, if the power recently claimed by the Legislature has a legal and a constitutional existence. The charter of the Providence Bank was the first that was granted by the Legislature of Rhode Island. For several years it was the only bank in the State. Between the date of its charter, however, and June, 1822, several charters were granted, substantially like it. In June, 1822, the time when the act imposing a tax on banks went into operation, the charter of the Mount Hope Bank, in Warren, was granted.

The eighth section provides "that this Act of Incorporation be, and the same is hereby declared to be, subject to all *acts which [520 may be passed by the General Assembly, in amendment or repeal thereof, or in any way affecting the same."

The power of the Legislature to tax the banks had been previously denied; and the argument against that power was delivered but a few days before the granting the charter of the Mount Hope Bank. All the charters since contain a similar reservation.

From the earliest period down to the Act of 1822, taxes in Rhode Island had been uniform. The proportion which each town was bound to contribute was settled by an Act passed in 1747. By the Act of 1747 the proportion which the town of Providence paid towards the expenses of the State was one-ninth. A new apportionment among the several towns in the State was made in 1796, by which the town of Providence was required to pay one-fifth. In 1824 another apportionment fixed nearly one-third upon that town. Only one tax, however, has ever been ordered under that estimate.

The mode of collecting taxes under these various laws produced great uniformity as to individuals. The treasurer of the State issued his warrant to the treasurers of the several towns, requiring them to collect from the inhabitants each town's proportion of the sum to be raised. The proportion of each town was assessed upon individuals, according to the supposed value of their real and personal estate. This has been the usage from the earliest settlement of the State, with very slight variations, down to the Act of 1822. With the exception of one tax of fifteen thousand dollars, ordered by an Act of May, 1824, the whole expenses of the State have been paid under the Act of 1822. The whole amount collected under the License Act of 1822, from its commencement to the end of the year 1827, is thirty-five thousand nine hundred and twenty-one dollars twelve cents. Of that amount twenty-six thousand three hundred and eighty dollars eighty-six cents was paid by the town of Providence, and twelve thousand eight hundred and eighteen dollars by the banks. The largest proportion of the bank capital is in that town, and the effect of the License Act has been to 521 *burden it with more than two-thirds of the taxes of the State. The amount paid under the act in 1828 and 1829, by the town of Providence, was three-fourths of the whole. The proportion has been increasing against the town from 1822 to the present time, as will be seen by an examination of the accounts of the treasury. The whole real estate, and all other property in the State, is exempted from taxation; and the paying part of the business of government thrown principally upon one town.

The question for the consideration of the court is, whether such a tax, so far as regards the banks whose charters were granted previous to 1822, and without any reservation of authority over them, is a constitutional tax? It will be kept in mind that the charters of all banks established since May, 1822, contain ample reservations of power.

The charter of the Providence Bank was granted in November, 1791; and until 1797 it was the only bank in the State. Its capital at first was fixed at two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but it was subsequently increased to five hundred thousand dollars. Although no bonus was paid to the State, yet the advantages expected by the public are fully stated in the charter, and constitute the consideration of the contract. The contract was that the stockholders should be entitled to all the advantages of employing their money in banking business, through the agency of a corporation, and the State to all the benefit of a "well regulated bank." These advantages were expected by the parties, for they are expressly stated in the charter, and constitute reciprocal rights and obligations. Whenever the business of the corporation is so managed as to injure instead of benefiting the public; whenever an undue amount of bills is issued; specie payments refused, and the currency depreciated; then is there a violation of the contract on the part of the stockholders, and the sovereign may interfere, for they contracted to maintain a "well regulated bank." The State has a right to see this object accomplished, and to pass all laws necessary for the purpose. The admission which we most freely make, of a power in the State, so to regulate the conduct of corporations as to attain the objects of their formation may appear *to conflict with a proposition [522 which we shall endeavor to sustain, which is this—that the State, by becoming a party to the contract, was as much bound to respect the rights of the other party as if the State had been an individual. There is, however, in reality, no hostility between the admission and the proposition. All the legislative power which the State has a right to exert, is remedial in its character, furnishing remedies for or against the corporations, and imposing penalties for violations of their contract. The same power might have been exercised over the Dartmouth College, and the same authority is constantly exercised in all the States over corporations of their own creation. The proceedings of the legislatures of some of the States are of a mixed character, partly legislative and partly judicial. So far as they are legislative, they are clearly remedial; so far as they are judicial, they annex penalties for doing what, under a more regular system of jurisprudence, they would be adjudged to have forfeited their charter for doing.

In the examination of this case, it will be necessary to consider,

1. The contract, the rights which it confers on one party, and the obligations it imposes on the other.

2. The Act of 1822, and the effect which that act has upon the rights conferred by the contract.

3. The provision in the Constitution of the United States, against impairing the obligation of contracts.

First, what was the contract? This general question involves an inquiry into the elements which usually constitute what the law terms a contract. The usual ingredients are: a consideration, parties, and a subject matter. What is called the obligation of a contract is the duty which the law imposes upon a party not to disturb any of the legal rights conferred upon the other party. The extent of the rights of one party, therefore, is the measure of the obligation of the other.

In the first place, there was a full and an ample consideration; not a consideration implied, but expressly stated. The risk of advancing two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in 1791, to be employed in banking business, was very *great. The Constitu- [523 tion of the United States was not ratified in Rhode Island, we think, until the year 1790. Although at that period the people of that State had been "taught by the experience of Europe and America that well regulated banks were highly useful to society," yet they had not been taught that they were very profitable to the stockholders. The times were still very feverish. The shock occasioned by paper money had not entirely subsided. The effect of the Constitution of the general government had not been ascertained. Money was very scarce, credit very low, and punctuality out of the question. Indeed, it is stated in the charter, that one of the effects beneficial to the public, expected from the bank, was to promote punctuality in payments. The wonderful activity given to trade a short time after, by the war in Europe, was then unlooked for. Under these circumstances, it required all the influence of the leading men in the town of Providence, to obtain money sufficient for so hazardous and doubtful an enterprise. So uncertain was the experiment, that a subscription could not be obtained without providing in the charter a remedy for the collection of debts due to the bank, which was withheld from all individuals. This remedy consisted in the power of attaching the real and personal estate of the debtor on mesne process. In practice, this amounted to a priority of payment. The State willingly granted this, in consideration of the value of the institution to the public, and the hazard to the stockholders. The same remedy has been granted to all banks since, in order that one may have no advantage over the other.

Notwithstanding these inducements, a period of six years elapsed before another bank went into operation. The first meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of Rhode Island was at Newport, in January, 1797. The consideration then was ample. The stockholders purchased the privilege of banking. They paid for it a high price, and the case will result in a question whether they are to pay for it again.

The parties to the contract were the stockholders in their individual capacity, on one side, and the State in its sovereign character on the other. It was not a contract between the 524 State and the corporation; the corporation had no existence until the contract was completed. The corporation, instead of being a party, was the subject of the contract. It was the thing granted, and not the person to whom the grant was made. The other party was a State, possessing various and extensive sovereign powers. In making this contract, it acted in its sovereign character, for it had no other character in which it could act. It meant to bind itself in its sovereign character, for there was no other character which it could bind. It was well known that the principal strength of sovereignty consisted in its power of making laws, and that the only effectual mode of binding sovereignty was to restrain its law-making power; and that, to restrain its law-making power upon all subjects but one, and leave it free upon that, was tantamount to no restraint at all. If, therefore, the State was a party to a contract, it intended to bind its law-making power. The law presumes that a party understands the legal effect of a contract, and that he intends that legal effect. The legal effect of a contract is to bind the parties to all its stipulations—to bind them in the capacity in which they contracted, and to bind them equally. It was intended, then, that both the parties should be bound, and that, consequently, neither should possess the power to liberate itself without the consent of the other. It therefore results from the fact that the charter is a contract; that the State meant to bind itself in its sovereign capacity, and to restrain the exercise of all its law-making powers, so that it should not be able to resume the grant, or to render Peters 4.

the subject of the grant of no value, or to make its value dependent on its own will, instead of being dependent upon the terms of the contract and the law of the land.

But further: the fact of the State's having become a party to a contract is not only conclusive evidence that it intended to bind itself, and to restrain all its law-making powers, but it is evidence of the extent to which it meant to impose that restraint. The object of binding the State at all was to secure the rights of the other party: consequently, the degree of restraint must be such as will afford that security. There *is an absurdity in saying that the State [525 meant to bind itself, in order to secure the rights of the other party, and saying, at the same time, it intended a less degree of restraint than was sufficient for the purpose.

If the State intended to be bound at all, it intended to be bound to the same extent as though it had been an individual, and not a sovereign State. A contract, in its very nature imports reciprocity of rights and obligations. One party is not to be bound to a greater extent than the other unless it is so expressed, or unless it is implied from necessity.

Having briefly considered what was the consideration of the contract and who were the parties, a more important object presents itself, which is, to ascertain its obligation. This can be done in no other way than by resorting to its subject matter.

Rights and obligations are correlative terms. The extent of the rights of one party is the exact measure of the obligation of the other; for, in the language of this court, "every grant implies an obligation not to re-assert the right granted."

1. There was granted to the stockholders and to their successors a perpetual right to the powers and capacities of a corporation denominated "the President, Directors and Company of the Providence Bank."

2. There was also granted a perpetual right to employ five hundred thousand dollars in the banking business.

It would be absurd to say that the stockholders obtained an act of incorporation for the sake of an act of incorporation—that they obtained a grant of the right of doing banking business for the sake of banking business; but both were granted for the profit that might arise from them. Is it not fairly to be implied that the amount of that profit should be all that could be made by banking business under the general laws of the land? The corporation, and the right to transact banking business, were granted as mere means: the end was the expected profit.

It must be agreed that the charter was to be perpetual, and that the stockholders cannot be deprived of it. It must *be agreed that [526 the right to transact banking business was to be perpetual, and that the stockholders cannot be deprived of it. Must it not, then, be agreed that the right to all the profits was to be perpetual, and that the stockholders cannot be deprived of it? If the right to the means was intended to be legal rights, was not the right to the end to be of the same character? Can it be believed that perpetual means would be granted to obtain a doubtful and uncertain end? That the subordinate parts of the contract should be held as rights, subject only to the law of the land; but that the main object should be possessed only as a legislative indulgence? The presumption of law is that all the rights between the same parties, and conferred by the same grant, are to be of the same character, subject to the same tenure, and to continue during the same time. Nothing but strong language to the contrary will create a difference. The act of incorporation is a legal right, subject to no partial or direct legislation. The right to banking business is a legal right, subject to no partial or direct legislation. Why, then, is not a perpetual right to all the profits a legal right, and subject to no partial legislation? Why should the control of the State over one of these rights be greater than over the other.

We will now examine the Act of 1822 with a view to ascertain whether it involves the power to destroy the rights granted by the contract.

The very title of the act is significant. It is "an act imposing a duty on licensed persons and others, and bodies corporate, within the State." It classes the banks with licensed persons. It considers them, not as exercising their legal rights under their contract, but as enjoying privileges by the license and permission of the State.

It enacts that there shall be, hereafter, annually paid by the persons and bodies corporate within this State, herein named, the following sums, to wit:

"By each and every person licensed by the town councils of the several towns, the sum of two dollars, to be paid to the town councils before granting the license, and by them to be paid over to the general treasurer.

527* "By each and every money broker, or money changer, and each and every vendor of foreign lottery tickets, the sum of one hundred dollars, to be paid to the town councils at the time of granting licenses to those persons.

"By each and every bank within this State (except the Bank of the United States), the sum of fifty cents on each and every thousand dollars of the capital stock actually paid in."

It is too apparent to be denied that the Legislature considered the charter of the banks as mere licenses. Even on that ground, it would have been no more than equal justice to have required the fee when the license was granted, as is provided in relation to all the other licensed persons mentioned in the act. It is a requisition, a duty. It lays no claim to the character of a tax: A tax implies proportion. (5 Rep., 53.) It is a specific duty upon the privilege of the bank, upon the franchise granted and paid for. Its advocates do not deny that this is its character: on the contrary, they assert it and justify it. They are driven to this by necessity, for there is no other character that can attach to it.

No one pretends that it is a tax upon the property of the banks. The act provides "that hereafter, there shall be annually paid by the persons and bodies corporate, within this State, herein named, to and for the use of the State, the following sums, to wit: by each and every bank one dollar twenty-five cents on each and every thousand dollars of the capital stock actually paid in." The capital stock is referred to in order to equalize the duty among the banks themselves. The duty is not upon the capital stock, but upon the banks. In relation to each other, it is a duty in proportion to the capital stock. In relation to all other persons, it is a direct and arbitrary acquisition, not based upon property, not controlled by any usage, and depending for its amount entirely upon the will and caprice of one of the parties to the contract.

There are but three views that can be taken of this act. It is, first, either a tax upon the persons or polls of the corporations, which subjects it to the objection that it does not at the same time tax the persons of other corporations or individuals; *or, second, [528 it is a tax upon the franchise of the bank, which was purchased by the stockholders; or, third, it is a tax upon the capital stock of the bank, which is a new species of property, and one of the fruits of the contract. The intention was to tax the franchise—to consider the banks as licensed persons—and, in common with other licensed persons, to compel them to pay an annual stipend for the privileges they enjoy. Suppose the Providence Bank had paid fifty thousand dollars for these privileges at the time of receiving their charter, could it be compelled to pay for them again? How does it alter the case that the payment was in benefits of another kind, which the State acknowledges to have received? Go farther: suppose this franchise to have been a free gift, can payment be subsequently demanded?

But whether the Act of 1822 is a tax upon the privileges of the banks, or upon their property, or a duty or requisition upon them as licensed persons, will not essentially vary the question; inasmuch as it must be conceded, on all hands, that it involves the power to destroy all their beneficial rights. This was one of the points expressly decided in M'ulloch's case. If the State has jurisdiction over the subject matter; if it can select its own contract, or the privileges or property conferred by its own contract, and impose a specific duty upon them, and them alone, it can destroy those privileges, because it must necessarily be the sole judge of the amount. Although at present the expenses of the State are small, yet, in cases of war, internal commotions, or the happening of any other causes which would increase our expenditures, it will probably be thought expedient and just that the banks should contribute the same proportion then as now. If it is deemed legal and honest to load them with one-third of all the burdens of government now, why will it not be legal and just then? Nay, why not one-half, or three-quarters, or the whole? If this court decide this tax to be constitutional, must it not decide that a requisition of one-half of the income of the capital stock will be constitutional? In whatever point of view, therefore, this act is considered, it involves the power, and, as we shall directly show, the legal power, *the legal right to destroy the contract [529 to which the State is a party.

An examination of the Constitution of the United States will show that this is the necessary result. The clause belonging to this subject is, "that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

"No State shall pass any law!" It intended to exclude all laws having that effect. It made no exception in favor of laws imposing taxes; but it intended that the taking-power, like all other powers, should be so exercised as not to impair the obligation of contracts. What use would there have been in the prohibition if it had left the State free as to one of its powers? Would not such freedom have destroyed the whole effect of the provision?

But further: No State shall pass any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." It does not confine itself to the direct and express, but extends to all the implied obligations. It also extends to all contracts—those to which a State is a party, as well as the contracts of individuals.

"No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts!" Does this prohibit the power of impairing contracts, or the exercise of that power? It must be remembered that this, and all the other prohibitions against the States, are addressed not to natural persons, possessing physical powers, but to artificial persons, possessing legal powers. A prohibition not to steal, leaves the natural person with the physical power of violating the injunction, but does it not destroy the legal power? The powers of the States are all legal powers. They have no physical or natural powers. A prohibition, therefore, against the exercise of a legal power, is an annihilation of the power itself; and any law so dependent upon the existence of such a power, or so closely connected with it as to render it practically impossible to sustain the law without submitting to the exercise of the power, must be an unconstitutional law.

Apply this principle to the present case. The State has no power to impair its own contract. It cannot resume the charter, it cannot prohibit banking business, it cannot take all the income of the capital. It will be 530] agreed that no such *power can be exercised. How, then, can it exist? How can a legal power exist which it is unlawful to use, or a legal right which cannot be exercised? Physical powers may exist, the action of which is prohibited; but legal powers exist only in action. They are contemplated only with a view to their exercise. A legal power is a right to do certain things. A power to destroy the rights of the banks is, therefore, equivalent to the actual destruction of them; because a power to destroy is a legal right to destroy. Considered in relation to its citizens, all the powers of sovereignty are legal rights.

We say that if it is admitted that the charter is a contract, the whole controversy is admitted; because every contract necessarily excludes all power in either of the parties to destroy the rights which vest under it. A tax upon the franchise is a tax upon the contract itself. The law implies a right in the States to tax the banks; that is, the property of the banks; but it does not imply a right to destroy. The State of Rhode Island has contracted not to tax the Blackstone Canal. The State of New Jersey contracted, in the case of New Jersey v. Wilson, not to tax certain lands. The exemption of that canal and those lands is a privilege or franchise. Would a tax upon that privilege be valid? Would it not violate the spirit of the contract? Would it not be mere evasion? The terms of the contract exempted the lands from taxation; but would not that contract have been rendered of no value, if, instead of taxing the lands, they had taxed the privileges or exemption conferred by that contract?

We contend, then, that the power in question is necessarily excluded, because it is inconsistent with the main and leading intention of the parties, which was to make a contract and to bind themselves by it.

How can that be constitutional which necessarily entails consequences that are prohibited by the Constitution? How can a law which, beyond all human control, arms the Legislature with the legal right of doing what the Constitution prohibits their doing, be constitutional? Nay, worse; which puts them in the actual possession of a power, the very existence *of which is a violation of the [531 contract? How can the Legislature legislate themselves into the possession of a power not only not granted, but expressly withheld by the people?

But a law involving the power to destroy is equivalent to a law which actually does destroy, for another reason. The Constitution intended not only that a law which actually impairs a contract should be void, but it also intended that this court should possess and exercise the power of declaring it void.

The Act of 1822, if admitted to be valid, will deprive this court of this power. If the subject and the mode of taxation are admitted to be constitutional, the amount rests in the discretion of the Legislature. The court must submit to any amount that may be imposed. Their power to protect the rights of the individual is at an end the moment this law is declared to be valid. That power constitutes the remedy of the banks. This law takes from the banks all right to appeal to this court for relief, and all power in the court to extend that relief. Can this court surrender that power? Are not all its legal powers legal duties? Is this court to obey the Constitution and retain the power of declaring void a law which the State may pass, destroying the banks, or to obey the Act of 1822, which deprives them of that power? Is it to rest with the Legislature of Rhode Island to say whether an individual shall retain a constitutional remedy and this court a constitutional power? Is it for the State, against whom this remedy and this power were provided, to legislate the other party out of them? This remedy and this power are the constitutional barriers for the protection of private rights; and an attack upon the outposts is as undisguised war as upon the Constitution itself.

An important question in the case remains yet to be considered. Does not the contract of 1791 afford a necessary implication of an exemption from all modes of taxation which involve the power to destroy? That may be said to be implied, which, from a fair construction of all parts of an instrument, appears to have been the probable intention of *the [532 parties. That is necessarily implied, without which the obvious and main intention of the parties would be defeated.

Implications bear the same relation to the express provisions of a contract that circumstantial docs to positive evidence. Perhaps nothing short of a necessary implication would create a total exemption from the taxing power. A fair and ordinary implication would be sufficient to qualify that power, by confining it to the usual modes.

In the present case we shall attempt to show that there is a necessary implication that the State should neither exercise nor possess the power of destroying any of the rights conferred by the contract. We do not confine the proposition to one mode of destroying these rights; but we mean to contend that all modes in which sovereign power can exert itself were necessarily excluded. The taxing power is undoubtedly of vital importance, though not more so than many others. It is indispensable to the support of government, and so are nearly all the powers which sovereignty usually exercises.

The power to constitute property, or to give to men the dominion over external objects—the power to transmit that dominion from hand to hand, by deeds, wills, descent, and the various other modes—is surely as necessary a power as any other can be. The one creates property; the taxing power operates upon it after it is created.

The attempt to give to the taxing power an importance belonging to no other sovereign power, is reviving the dispute of the relative importance of the stomach and the lungs to animal life.

Before any aid, however, can be derived from the supposed importance of the taxing power, it must be shown that this mode of exerting it is essential to the State. How can it be of vital importance to government to possess the power to tax the money of one man, without at the same time taxing the money of others? How can the existence of government depend on its power to destroy its contracts? There is nothing, then, growing out of the peculiar importance of the power in question, which will rebut any presumption of an exemption from its exercise.

533*] *Is the justice or fairness of this proceeding so very urgent? Is the equity of imposing one-third of all the expenses of the State on the banks of such a nature as to induce us to believe that the parties probably had it in their minds? Suppose the stockholders of the Providence Bank had been informed, in 1791, before they had advanced their money, that, instead of peculiar advantages, they were to be subjected to peculiar burdens; would they have accepted their charter? Suppose they had been informed that, instead of the long established usage of uniform taxes, sovereignty intended to call up one of its dormant powers and spend its whole force upon their money—and their money alone; would they have parted with the money? Did they mean or expect to pay a new consideration differing from the one specified in the charter, and which the State acknowledged to have received? No very strong equity, therefore, and no pressing necessity, require the exercise or the existence of such a power. But such a power is necessarily excluded, because it is inconsistent with the main and leading intention of the parties, and it is inconsistent with the legal effect of a grant.

There is another mode by which it may be shown that the law impairs the contract, and that is by ascertaining its legal effect. While upon this point, it may be expedient to notice an argument on the opposite side, which we have reason to believe has had some effect, even on professional minds. It is this: Admitting that the charter is a contract; that it binds the parties; that it confers legal rights on one party and imposes legal obligations on the other; yet, that those legal rights are like the legal rights of all other persons, subject to the sovereignty of the State, and, consequently, subject to taxation; that, in fact, the only difference between legal rights conferred by one individual upon another individual, and by a State upon an individual, is a difference of parties; that they are legal rights, when conveyed by an individual, and can be no more when conveyed by the State; that if specific taxation is not inconsistent with legal rights conveyed by an individual, it is not inconsistent with legal rights conveyed by the State; and that, [*534 if the contract is not violated in the one case, it is not violated in the other.

This popular argument must be answered, and satisfactorily answered, or the case is against us. One moment's consideration of the legal effect of a grant will show the fallacy of this view of the subject, which supposes that the legal right to an acre of land, or to any other property or privilege, is not only of the same nature, but of the same extent when conveyed by an individual as when conveyed by a sovereign; whereas, in all cases of unrestricted grants, the extent of the legal rights of the grantee depends mainly, if not entirely, on the extent of the legal rights of the grantor. An unrestricted grant passes to the grantee, or extinguishes all the grantor's interest in and power over the subject which are inconsistent with the right intended to be granted. "A grant," say this court in Fletcher v. Peck, "is, in its very nature, an extinguishment of all the rights of the grantor, and implies an obligation not to re-assert that right."

It is no matter who the granting party is or what he is; no matter in what capacity he acts; no matter how limited or how extensive is his interest or his power; all his power and all his interest, so far as they do not consist with the rights granted, are either transferred or extinguished by the grant. If he is an individual, individual interest and individual power are transferred or extinguished. If a corporation, corporate interests and corporate powers. And, if a sovereign, sovereign interests and sovereign powers.

The question then arises whether it can be shown that such a tax is necessary? Can it even be shown to be just? What necessity or what justice can require the money of one class of men to bear all the burdens of the State? Other governments exist without such odious measures. Even Rhode Island did not discover the necessity of resorting to them until 1822. How pressing must that necessity be which it required two hundred years to discover!

The first case before this court was a direct tax upon the operations of The Bank of the United States within the State of Maryland; and the second, a tax by the city council of Charleston upon the six and seven per cent. stocks of the United States.

535*] *The same principle prevailed in both cases. The first was an unanimous, the second a divided opinion; but divided upon the question whether the tax was an income or a specific tax. The leading principle established by M'Culloch's case, and confirmed by the case of the city council, is this: that the Constitution of the United States, having conferred upon the general government certain enumerated and specific powers, conferred all the means necessary to the execution of those powers; that the incorporation of a bank was a necessary and proper instrument of fiscal operations; that the law establishing the bank being a law authorized by the Constitution was supreme; and that the unavoidable consequence of that supremacy was that no State could pass any law conflicting with it; and, that as the act of the State of Maryland imposing the tax involved the power of destroying the bank, it was inconsistent with the supremacy of the law establishing the bank.

To suppose that The Bank of the United States was declared by the court to be exempted from the action of State legislation because it was The Bank of the United States, or because it was a means of power in the hands of the general government, would be taking but a narrow view of the principle of M'Culloch's case. That a bank was a necessary and proper instrument of power, constituted but a subordinate part of the splendid argument employed on that memorable occasion. It was necessary to take a step much farther in advance; to occupy much higher ground; to show that, being a necessary instrument of power, the Constitution intended to protect it from State legislation. Unless that ground had been occupied, there would have been an end to the bank. The whole case turned upon the intention of the Constitution.

The fact of its being an authorized means in the hands of the general government was used as an argument to show that it was intended to be placed beyond the reach of the States. It was the protection afforded to these means by the Constitution, and not the character or inherent virtue of the means themselves, that called out the power and firmness of the court. Neither the bank nor the custom-house, the 536*] *Navy or the Army, could plead sufficient merit of their own; but it was because they were sheltered behind the Constitution that State legislation could not reach them.

Having established the proposition that the Constitution had impliedly prohibited the States from interfering with the machinery of the general government, the court proceeded to show that the act of the State of Maryland involved the power of destroying what the States had no power to destroy. Not that the act of itself actually did or would destroy, but that it involved the power of destroying. We therefore repeat the assertion that it was not because The Bank of United States was an instrument of government, but because it was a prohibited subject, that the court declared the act of Maryland to be an unconstitutional act. The great principle is this: because the Constitution will not permit a State to destroy, it will not permit a law involving the power to destroy. In order to show that the case turned entirely on that point, let us suppose that the Peters 4.

court had arrived to the conclusion that the bank was an authorized instrument of government, but that it was not the intention of the Constitution to prohibit the States from interfering with those instruments; would it not have been necessary to have decided that the Maryland act was constitutional? Of what importance was it that the bank was an authorized means of power other than this, that it afforded a key to the meaning of the Constitution? If the bank was a legitimate and proper instrument of power, then the Constitution intended to protect it. If not, then no protection was intended. The question whether it was a necessary and proper means, was auxiliary to the great question, whether the Constitution intended to shelter it; and when the court arrived to the conclusion that such protection was intended, they interfered, not in behalf of the bank, but in behalf of the sanctuary to which it had fled. They decided against the tax, because the subject had been placed beyond the power of the States by the Constitution. They decided, not on account of the subject, but on account of the power that protected it; they decided that a prohibition against destruction was a prohibition against a law involving the power of destruction. The case of the *Providence [537 Bank starts very far in advance of The Bank of the United States. It is not necessary to resort to implication to prove that the rights of the former are protected by the Constitution. There is an express clause to that effect, and the court will not forget that it is the prohibition, and not the important or unimportant subject that stands behind it, that constitutes the shield against hostile legislation.

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts, or duties on imports and exports, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

To the framers of the Constitution, some of the subjects here prohibited probably appeared to be more important than others. They probably thought it more important to deprive the States of the power of forming alliances with foreign nations than of emitting bills of credit. The exercise of the one power by the States would merely incommode the general government: the exercise of the other endangers its very existence. Yet are not these subjects, judicially, of equal importance? Equally important, because equally prohibited? Are not all the prohibited subjects of equal importance, and have the States any more power to violate one prohibition than another?

It may be said that The Bank of the United States was established by a law of the general government, and that it was the supremacy of the law which rendered all conflicting laws of the States inoperative. The supremacy of the law was a reason, and a conclusive reason, to induce the court to imply a prohibition. It was not the supremacy of the law, but the implied constitutional prohibition, which induced the court to protect the bank. The rights conferred upon The Bank of the United States by its charter, are inviolable 538 and supreme, as regards all the States. Are not the rights of the Providence Bank, and the law which conferred those rights, inviolable and supreme as regards Rhode Island? Is not that law a contract; those rights the fruit of that contract? What constitutes the supremacy of a law in regard to the States, if it is not their total want of power to interfere with its regular operation, or to destroy the rights which it confers? Can the Legislature of Rhode Island repeal the law incorporating the Providence Bank? Can they alter any of its essential provisions? Is it not supreme, or, in homelier English, above their reach? The only difference between the law incorporating The Bank of the United States and the law incorporating the Providence Bank, as regards their character of supremacy, is, that the former is supreme as regards all the States, the latter as regards Rhode Island only. The supremacy of both originates in contract. The fundamental contract of the Union, or the Constitution, imparts supremacy to the laws of the Union, and binds all the States. The contract with the Providence Bank imparts supremacy to all the rights which it confers, and binds one of the States. The sphere of action is more limited, and the parties less numerous in the one case than in the other, and that is the only substantial difference between them.

To the Legislature, say the court, in Fletcher v. Peck, all legislative power belongs. But the question whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public be in the nature of the legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection. This language was used in relation to a law of Georgia, attempting to resume the subject of its own grants. Is it not equally applicable to the case before the court? The income of the capitals of the banks is the subject of the grants in this case; land the subject of the grant in that. If a State cannot resume one subject of its grant, can it another? If it cannot resume it directly, can it indirectly? Is there any difference between a direct and a consequential interference with a prohibited subject? The uniform language of this court is in the negative. The warmest advocate for State power will find it difficult to discover any principle from which it 539 can be implied that one *party to a contract reserves to himself the power of destroying all the rights conferred by the contract.

In relation to individual parties under the law, it will be conceded that no such power can exist. In relation to sovereign parties under the Constitution, is not the rule necessarily the same? Is not the dominion of the Constitution over the States the same, as to its nature and extent, as that of law over individuals? If, in a contract between individuals, no illegal power can be implied, in a contract with a sovereign, can any unconstitutional power be implied? By becoming a party to a contract, a State imposes upon itself additional obligations and additional duties. To suppose that these duties and these obligations do not qualify its rights, is tantamount to denying that they are obligations and duties. To impose upon an individual or a sovereign an obligation, without an equivalent limitation of its legal and moral power, is as impossible as to produce an effect without a cause. What is an obligation but a limitation of previous power? What is a duty but the abandonment of some corresponding right?

The proposition that a State has the same power over the rights conferred by its own contract as over all other legal rights, is a denial that any obligation is created by its contract; for, if it creates any obligation, that obligation does not exist in relation to the legal rights of those with whom the State has made no contract. The necessary consequence is, that a limitation of State authority to the extent of this superadded obligation must be created; and a limitation which does not exist in relation to the legal rights of others.

Mr. Hazard, for the defendants.

An Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island, passed in 1791, incorporating the Providence Bank, is said to be a contract between the Legislature and that bank; and it is contended that a general law passed by the Legislature in the year 1822, and the acts in amendment thereof, "imposing a duty upon licensed persons and others, and upon bodies corporate, within that State," are laws impairing the obligation of that contract, and violating the Constitution of the United States. Whether this be so or not depends upon the question:

*Whether there is anything in the [*540] act incorporating the Providence Bank which exempts that bank from the taxing power of the State; or whether the corporate character of the bank exempts its operations from the action of the State authority.

If the General Assembly, by the Incorporating Act of 1791 or by the acts in addition thereto, did bind the State to exempt this corporation, in perpetuity, from the taxing power of the State, the obligation must either be expressed in those acts, or must be clearly implied from the terms of them; or the exemption must be one of the necessary incidents or immunities of a corporation.

It appears by the preamble to the charter, that about a year after this bank had been established, its president and directors petitioned the General Assembly for an act of incorporation. The prayer of the petition was granted, and an act passed in conformity to it. The act contains a detail of the ordinary properties and capacities of a corporation, such as are alike incident to every corporation of whatever description, and as would appertain to, and be exercised by it, whether expressly granted or not. The act further approves of the private regulations adopted by the company; it exempts the several stockholders from personal liability beyond the amount of their respective shares of stock. It gives to the company an exclusive, summary, legal process for the collection of debts due to them; and lastly, it makes provision for securing the bills of the bank from forgery. The three acts in amendment make some improvement in the bank process, as it is called; empower the directors to fill vacancies, and provide that the shares of the stockholders shall be held pledged to the bank for their debts due to it.

In these provisions (which are the whole contents of the bank charter) there is no express grant of the exemption claimed, and I am not able to find anything in them from which the most remote inference can be drawn of an intention, on the part of the Legislature, to make such a grant. What was granted, and intended to be granted, has no connection with what is now claimed as part of the grant. All that was 541 done by the Legislature was to convert a banking copartnership into a body politic; and their having done this does not warrant the inference that they meant to make to that company a further donation either of money or immunities, other than such as necessarily appertains to all corporate bodies. If there is anything in that charter from which such an inference can fairly be drawn, it is to be shown by the plaintiffs.

Is, then, an exemption from the taxing power of the State a necessary incident of this corporation? If it is, it must be an incident of all corporations of every description; for so far as this exemption is the question, there is nothing to distinguish a banking corporation from any other; but if a distinction was to be made, it would not be in favor of banks, which, being moneyed, and money-making institutions, might be considered as the most appropriate objects of taxation.

It is said by the writers on the subject of corporations that such capacities and qualities as are necessary to the creation and legal being of a corporation, and such only, are incidents of the corporation. But it cannot be said that an exemption from taxes is necessary to the existence of a corporation, especially a moneyed corporation. A corporation is as competent to pay duties imposed upon it as brokers, or retailers, or distillers, or auctioneers, or any other individuals or companies of any other trade, craft, or profession; and its being required to pay them is in no way inconsistent with its corporate existence or its corporate character. Such duties have, in fact, been imposed upon them (the banking companies) by the government of the Union, and have been for many years, and still are imposed upon them by many of the States, and no difficulty has been experienced in the collection of them. It is, moreover, admitted that when the power of taxing is expressly reserved in the charters of banks, they may consistently be taxed. If this be so, there is nothing in the power of taxing which is inconsistent with the existence of such corporations, or with the full enjoyment of their franchises. It is plain, therefore, that an exemption from taxes is not one of the necessary 542 incidents or immunities of such a corporation. This being the case, and it being equally plain (as has already been shown) that the charter itself of the Providence Bank contains no express or implied relinquishment on the part of the State of the power of taxing, it seems to follow that the acts of the Legislature of Rhode Island "imposing a duty upon licensed persons and others, and upon bodies corporate within that State," do not impair the obligation of any contract of the State with Peters 4.

the plaintiffs, nor violate the Constitution of the United States.

One of the breaches of contract with which the Legislature of Rhode Island is charged by plaintiffs, is thus stated by them: their charter, they say, grants and secures to them forever "all the profits arising from the employment of their capital in banking business." And this grant, they contend, is impaired by the law of 1822, imposing a tax on the banks. The banks have, no doubt, a perfect right to all the profits to be derived from the corporate franchises granted to them. But no better right, surely, than other companies or individuals have to all the profits of their business, or to their estates, real and personal, and all the rents and income of them. And it has not yet been discovered that the exercise of the taxing power upon those subjects was inconsistent with the full enjoyment of those rights.

The power to tax banks for their corporate property, and to tax the stockholders for their stock, is not denied. But it is said that this is a tax upon the franchise; a tax upon the thing granted. The law speaks for itself. It imposes a duty upon the several banks; equal to one-eighth of one per cent. of the amount of the capital stocks of each actually paid in. If this is a duty on the franchises, why not? That those franchises are property, and valuable property, we know. Corporate franchises are thus described by Mr. Justice Story in the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat., 700): "They are, properly speaking, legal estates, vested in the corporation itself as soon as it is in esse. They are not mere legal powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest. The property of the corporation vests 543 upon the possession of its franchises. Whatever may be thought of the corporators, it cannot be denied that the corporation has a legal interest in them." He speaks of them elsewhere in the same case as "valuable hereditaments or property." And says, "that a grant of them is not distinguishable, in point of principle, from a grant of any other property." And these remarks were made in reference even to eleemosynary corporations, and corporations for literary purposes; and apply much more forcibly to these trading or moneyed corporations.

The opening counsel will recollect that one of these bank charters was sold in Rhode Island a few years ago for a large sum of money by a company to whom it had been granted several years before, but who had made no use of it. The plaintiffs tell us themselves that their franchises are valuable, and their stock sells for from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. advance. And well may it be so. Their interest money is compounded every sixty days; and that, too, on loans of mere paper bills which carry no interest. For, as the bills of the banks constitute the whole of the circulating medium, they gain, gratuitously, the interest on so much of their paper as is constantly absorbed in circulation—the amount of which we know is immense.

It was the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone (and the soundness of that opinion has been fully tested by the experience of statesmen) that the revenues of a State may be derived from duties and imposts on objects prudently selected, with much less expense and burden to the community than from direct taxation. What part is it, of the revenues of the United States, that is derived from the latter source? They have never resorted to direct taxation but on the most pressing occasions, nor until the collection from indirect taxes had proved inadequate to the exigencies of government. From the year 1791 to 1798, and again from 1813 to 1815, laws were passed by Congress laying duties on various commodities and trades. But the first direct tax was not laid until 1798, and the second and last not until 1815. Among the objects then thought most appropriate for taxing, all incorporated banks, as well as private 544 bankers, *banking companies and money dealers, were selected for duties; and those duties were regularly and readily paid, without any complaint from the banks of their being incompatible with their corporate existence, or their corporate rights.

There is no weight in the objection that the duty does not bear equally upon the whole community. It is not possible that taxes should be made to bear equally upon every member of the community, so as to draw from each one precisely in proportion to his property.

Nor, if this were practicable, would it be a wise or salutary system of taxation. It is certainly wiser and better to draw revenue from surplus income than from the immediate products of labor and industry; from commodities and trades which administer to the pleasures or the vices of men—from the luxuries and superfluities—than from the necessities of life. And thus the United States government began with duties on distilled spirits, on stills, on vendors of wines and spirits, on various articles of luxury, and on banks; and, as long as possible, avoided direct taxes and duties on the more necessary and useful articles, such as household furniture, farming utensils, and the various necessary articles of domestic manufacture.

The true question in this case is, whether the law complained of is a law impairing the obligation of a contract, in the sense those words bear in the Constitution of the United States. The power of taxation is "an incident of sovereignty;" and the government in whom it resides is alone competent, within its own jurisdiction, to judge and determine how, in what manner, and upon what objects that power shall be exercised. "That the power of taxation is one of vital importance," said the Chief Justice of this court, in delivering the opinion of the court in M'Culloch's case, "that it is retained by the States; that it is not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments; are truths which have never been denied." (4 Wheat., 425.) And again, in the same case "it is admitted that the power of taxing the people 545 and their property *is essential to the very existence of government, and may be legitimately exercised on the objects to which it is applicable, to the utmost extent to which the government may choose to carry it. The only security against the abuse of this power is found in the structure of the government itself. In imposing a tax, the Legislature acts upon its constituents. This is, in general, a sufficient security against erroneous and oppressive taxation." (4 Wheat., 428.)

It is admitted that land or other property granted by the State becomes liable to taxes in the hands of the grantees; and that there is no distinction, in point of principle, between a grant of corporate franchises and a grant of land or any other property, is conclusively shown by Mr. Justice Story in the Dartmouth College case. (4 Wheat., 684.) But land, it is said, exists, and is taxable before the grant. It exists, to be sure; but that circumstance is of no importance; since, as property of the State, it is not taxed, nor is taxable, until granted, any more than ungranted franchises are taxable. It may be said that, as corporate franchises take their existence only from the grant of them, the Legislature can annex to the grant whatever conditions or exemptions they please. If this were true, it would only show that the Legislature has power to grant an exemption from taxes in such cases as it may think proper; not that such exemption can be claimed when not granted. As these franchises are or may be valuable property, the State has an interest in the grants of them, and in the exercise of the taxing and other legislative powers over them, when they are granted, do exist, and are property, as much as it has in the case of any other grants of any other property.

The doctrine contended for by the plaintiffs amounts fully to this, that the powers of legislation must not be exercised, nay, must be annihilated, because they are liable to be abused. True, they would have this doctrine applied only in their own case; but it will hardly be conceded to them, though they so strenuously urge the claim, that they have a right to better security for their franchises than the rest of the community have for their privileges. But, *even if we adopt the plaintiff's appli- [546 cation of the doctrine, where will it lead and land us? The power to regulate the public revenue; to fix the rate of interest; to grant charters of incorporation; and to raise revenue by taxation, are branches and incidents of that portion of sovereignty still retained by the States, and are necessary to the very existence of government. But, according to the plaintiffs, all these powers are restrained and controlled, if not surrendered, by the granting of an ordinary act of incorporation to a private trading company; for, if the Legislature has power to regulate the currency, it may say that bank bills shall not make part of it; it may say that no bank bills shall issue of a denomination lower than one dollar, or higher than one thousand dollars. If it can fix the rate of interest, it may deprive the banks of their profits; if it can create other banks at pleasure, it may render those already granted of no value; if it can tax the shares of stock in the hands of stockholders, it may effectually break up the business. They profess not to carry their doctrine so far; they concede the exercise of such powers to the State; but, concessions made to save a doctrine from its own tendencies to absurdity, do not alter the principle. The doctrine itself does go the whole length pointed out. The general legislative powers specified do involve in them the power of reducing the profits of the banks, and of affecting their operations and their charters as fully as such a power is involved in the power of taxing.

The creation of a body politic is an exercise of legislative power; but it does not imply the relinquishment of any other portion of legislative power. The only obligation which the government imposes upon itself is, not unjustly and arbitrarily to defeat the grant contained in the charter; but, it has no more right to defeat any other legal grant than it has to defeat its own; and no law which would not impair the obligation of a contract between individuals, would impair it if the State was one of the contracting parties. It makes no difference that individuals cannot grant franchises; for it is already clearly shown that, in principle, there is no difference between grants of franchises and §47*] grants of other property. It is not wholesome doctrine for private corporations to imbibe that they are independent of the power that creates them, and that they shall be protected in setting it at defiance. Not only are their franchises and other property subject to the taxing power of States, but, so far as the public interests are affected by the action of a corporation, so far those operations must be under the control of government, whose province and paramount duty it is to provide for the public welfare. Thus, should the public good require the suppression of a paper currency, certainly the government would have a right to suppress it, although, in doing so they would destroy the banks whose paper composes that currency. It will not do to say that a chartered military company may not be put down, or that a chartered company engaged in supplying a city with water, or any such corporations, may not be suppressed, if the government should see good cause for suppressing them; and, in point of character, there is no difference between those corporations and banking corporations whose paper bills constitute the public money currency of the country. In the case of The Corporation of the Protestant Episcopal Church v. The City of New York, decided by the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and reported in 7 Cowen, 584; and in a similar case of another church congregation against that city, reported in 5 Cowen, 538, it was decided that a by-law of the city, forbidding the interment of the dead in the cemeteries and grounds appertaining to the churches, was valid and constitutional, although those grounds had been granted by the city itself for that express use, and the grants contained covenants for quiet enjoyment, and although certain private rights and pecuniary interests of individuals were cut off by that law; and it was decided in those cases that the city corporation could not, by its agreement, abridge its legislative powers. In the case of Brown v. The Penobscot Bank (8 Mass., 445), it was decided that a law imposing a heavy penalty upon banks which did not punctually redeem their bills, was valid; and in Foster v. The Essex Bank (16 Mass., 128), a law was decided to be valid which, for the purpose of giving time for remedies against a bank, prolonged its corporate existence against its wishes §48*] for the space of three years after its charter had expired.

There is another question—a most important one—which must always present itself in a case Peters 4.

like the present. That question is, whether any Legislature can, if it would, grant or surrender any portion of that power of which sovereignty itself consists. No one can entertain a doubt that the existing Legislature must have full power to make all such grants of public lands or other property, and to enter into all such contracts as this court declared to be binding and valid in the cases of Fletcher v. Peck, Terrett v. Taylor, and other similar cases. But such grants and contracts, it appears, are very different from an alienation, in perpetuity, of a portion of the taxing power of the State; which, in another case, this court declared to be “an incident of sovereignty,” and “essential to the existence of government.”

There are certain powers which are inherent in the people and cannot be alienated, even by the people themselves, much less by their representatives, to whom those powers are entrusted for a time; not to be annihilated, but to be exercised by them until other representatives shall be appointed in their places. The present generation of men may sell or bind themselves to servitude, but they cannot sell or bind their posterity.

It is immaterial whether the Legislature is restrained by a written constitution or not. The absolute rights of the constituents are not to be encroached upon because they may not think it necessary to attempt to guard them by such instruments, which, after all, but very differently answer the purpose for which they are intended; but, on the contrary, are too often made use of by false and forced constructions to justify the assumption of powers which the people never meant to grant.

The power of self-government is a power absolute and inherent in the people. But that power cannot exist distinct from the power of taxation. If the Legislature can exempt, forever, all corporations from taxes, they can exempt all merchants, all farmers, all manufacturers, or all of any other classes of the community. And, in this way, they can cut off §549 the sources of future revenue, and can fasten and entail forever the whole burden of government upon any portion of the people they please.

In the argument, the sentiments frequently expressed by this court and by different members of it on various occasions, seem to have been forgotten. “The question whether a law be void for its repugnance to the Constitution,” said the Chief Justice of this court in the case of Fletcher v. Peck, “is at all times a question of great delicacy; which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative, in a doubtful case.” “The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.” And in the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat., 125), “on more than one occasion the court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of such questions, and has declared that in no doubtful case would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the Constitution.” In Calder v. Bull (3 Dall., 386), it is said, by the late Mr. Justice Chase, “if ever I exercise the jurisdiction, I will never decide any law to be void but in a very clear case.” And by the late Mr.

Justice Iredell, in the same case: "The court will never resort to that authority but in a clear and urgent case." And in Cooper v. Telfair (4 Dall., 14), by the late Mr. Justice Patterson: "To authorize this court to pronounce any law to be void, it must be a clear, unequivocal breach of the Constitution; not a doubtful and argumentative implication."

Mr. Jones, in reply, argued that,

The term "contracts," used in the Constitution, comprehends as well those between two States, or between a State and private individuals, as those between two or more private individuals, citizens or not citizens of the State, the validity of whose law is drawn in question.

It comprehends not only such as remain executory or in action, but all vested rights and interests in any species of property, corporal or incorporeal; and, among these, the franchises and property of private corporations, 550*] whether created *for any expressed consideration of definite value, or for any declared objects of public utility; or purporting to be merely gratuitous, as between grantor and grantee; the implied benefits to the community being the only compensation supposed to be given or received; even donations from the State, or individuals, to eleemosynary and religious institutions, or to others of public beneficence or utility, whether incorporate or unincorporate.

It matters not by what means, or in what form the contract is created or the rights vested; whether by charter or grant from the State, after it became sovereign and independent; or during its colonial state, from the crown; or by a law in the ordinary form of legislative enactment: they are all equally protected by the constitutional prohibition.

This constitutional sanction rests not on the good faith supposed, by the comity of sovereigns, to inform the breasts of each other; nor upon the dread appeal to that ultima ratio which is ordinarily the only means of compulsory redress among themselves: but it acts, directly and practically upon State power and jurisdiction, and enables the tribunals to set aside the obnoxious law, and to uphold and enforce by judicial coercion the rights it attempts to violate.

It matters not what the kind or degree of force exerted by the law upon the contract or the vested right, whether it go directly and wholly to annul the one, or to destroy the other; or in any degree to impair or injure it; or to exert any authority over it, necessarily involving and inseparably inherent to an authority to annul, destroy or impair it: any compulsory change in the terms of the contract, or in the essential condition of the vested right, whether positively injurious or even positively beneficial, is within the same reason, and equally prohibited to the States.

The numerous decisions of this court, by which these principles have been judicially established, are too recent and familiar to require any particular reference. Their authority precludes all judicial question, and dispenses with all proof of the axioms deduced from them.

"Taxes (as accurately classed by writers on political economy) are either direct or indirect: 551*] direct when immediately *taken from income or capital; indirect when taken from them by making the owners pay for liberty to use certain articles, or to exercise certain privileges."

When, therefore, the bank is made to pay for liberty to exercise the privilege of employing a certain capital in the trade of banking, or of exerting any other of its chartered faculties; doubtless an indirect taxation of the capital itself, in what species of property soever consisting, results. But the converse of the proposition does not hold that a direct tax, in the ordinary mode of taxation, upon the capital of individuals invested in bank stock, or upon the product of the skill and labor bestowed in the employment of that capital, or upon the lands, ships, merchandise, or other specific property held by the bank for the benefit of the individual stockholders; necessarily operates, directly or indirectly, any duty or burden whatever on the corporate franchise itself, or the liberty to exercise the privileges conferred by the charter. The very material difference between the two modes of taxation, as they respectively affect the substantial terms of the charter and the essential condition of the rights vested by it, will be presently considered. The simple proposition that it is a duty imposed specifically on the corporate franchise, and the faculties and privileges with which the body corporate is endued by its charter, is what is now to be proved.

This is conceived to be clear from the import of the law itself.

The tax is laid directly on the bank in its corporate capacity, and the stock, belonging to individuals, is made the mere measure of the imposition on the aggregate body. This stock is not the property of the body taxed, but is divided into distinct and separate shares which belong to the several owners as their separate, individual estate, and subject to the independent disposal of each owner; as were the several capitals represented by the stock before they were subscribed to the stock, and while they subsisted in the original form of money. The capital paid in and represented by the stock is entrusted to the custody and husbandry of *the corporation; but, that [*552 artificial and transferable commodity, brought into life by the charter, endued with all its faculties by the charter, and denominated bank stock, is just as much the separate property and at the disposal of the respective owners, clear of all corporate control, as their several lands, chattels, and choses in action. This quality of the stock is just as distinctly guaranteed to the stockholders individually as is the corporate franchise, or any of its faculties, to the aggregate body. There is nothing of the social property or possession incident to partnership. Then, the property of one person is merely adopted as an arbitrary measure of the quantum of taxation on another. There is no more of indirect taxation upon the bank stock held by individuals (and thus made the arbitrary measure of taxation) than upon the lands, ships, choses in action, or other property held by the aggregate body for the benefit of the several corporators, but not comprehended in the rule of admeasurement for determining the mere quantum of taxation. The indirect effect upon all is precisely the same. But this indirect operation of the tax does not go in the least degree to relieve any one article of the property, nor any one of the proprietors affected by the operation from the general law of taxation operating upon them, in common with their fellow-citizens. Under that general law, all the property of every species held by the corporation for the benefit of the stockholders, is rated, qua property, in the common process of taxation; just the same as if the franchise or chartered faculties of the corporation had not been taxed at all: so are the money capitals invested in and represented by the shares of bank stock, and the products received in the form of dividends: all being still liable to be rated in the general taxation upon capital and income, without the least allowance for what is indirectly abstracted by the duty on the corporate body. This duty, therefore, does not even affect to be a circuitous mode of more conveniently taxing property in any form of fixed or of commercial capital or of income. It is no part of any general system, either of a property tax or an income tax; but is solely and exclusively [553] sively directed to the chartered liberty or privilege of a certain mode of artificial existence, and of exercising the peculiar faculties of that mode of existence. The tax is just as effective in terms and in obligation, whether the corporation, qua proprietor, own millions or nothing; whether the capital stock be at cent. per cent. advance, or the capital invested in it be utterly lost and sunk in the course of trade; whether the income in the form of dividends be large or small, or nothing. The amount of capital stock paid in is the unvarying standard of the duty on the bank; the actual state and condition of the bank, or of the stockholders as proprietors, enters not at all into the scheme of the duty. Then, how can the bare contingency that it may be one of the incidents and consequences of the scheme, indirectly, to burden the property of the bank, or of the stockholders, make this any the less a duty directed specifically, nay, exclusively, to the continued enjoyment of the corporate franchise to which it attached itself independent of every consideration of property.

The original grant of this franchise to the bank is admitted, it is presumed, to be in the nature of a contract between the State and the corporation, within the meaning of the Constitution; and, it is further presumed to be admitted, notwithstanding a good deal of ambiguity on this point in the opposite argument, that this contract, with all the peculiar rights and privileges vested under it, is of paramount obligation, and altogether irrevocable and indefeasible by any subsequent act of legislation. Admitted or denied, it cannot, at this day, be treated as a subject of controversy, unless this court should please to intimate a wish to review and reconsider the principles of former decisions. The obligation of the contract, if it means anything, means that the corporation shall always enjoy the franchise, with all the faculties, rights and privileges vested by the grant, upon the identical terms and conditions of that grant. The question, then, is a practical one. Does the law of 1822, against the consent of the grantee, materially change the original terms of the grant or the condition of the rights vested by it? In either case, it equally impairs the obligation of the contract.

tract, within the meaning of the Constitution.

*One of the most material terms of a [554] contract or grant is the consideration. The grant of a franchise is either in some sort gratuitous, as if founded on the implied consideration of diffusive benefits to the community, or on the expressed consideration of public utility; or of some pecuniary or other equivalent of definite value. In either case it is equally binding and indefeasible, without the consent of both parties. If, being gratuitous, it be burdened with a price; or if, being for valuable consideration the price be arbitrarily increased, who can doubt that the terms of the contract are materially changed? And if this be done by the retrospective operation of a law arbitrarily imposing such new terms, who can doubt that the obligation of the contract is injuriously impaired, if not destroyed?

The case of land purchased from the State being liable to taxation in common with the land of other individuals, is put as an argument, in point, against us. No one ever imagined that a change in the condition of the land from public to private domain necessarily annexed any pre-eminent privileges to it. So we admit, without qualification, that all property held by the bank by virtue of its charter is taxable in common with other property of the like description. So this court admitted was the condition of the property held by The Bank of the United States, though the bank itself or its franchises and privileges were not so. But suppose the Legislature, by a retrospective law, instead of subjecting the land to the general law of taxation, tax the grant itself, the title to hold and enjoy the land, and exact from the grantee over and above the original consideration, a new compensation for parting with the title of the public to an individual; or, what is the same thing, select his particular land from the mass of other taxable lands, and besides the general tax contributed for it by the proprietor in common with other proprietors of lands, exact an additional tax on his because his title or grant was derived from the State; so as, in effect, to tax the grant itself, or the right before granted, to hold and enjoy the land; this would be a clear infringement of the contract, as being a material and [555] injurious change in its terms: in effect, the exaction of an additional compensation for the grant.

Next, we are to examine the state and condition of the right vested by the grant, and see if that is subjected by the law in question to any material change from the state and condition in which the grant originally placed it.

This must be determined by the nature and extent of the vested right, then and now.

It is not at this day to be disputed that the grant imports a contract that the grantees shall absolutely and fully enjoy the liberty to exercise all the privileges and faculties, either expressed in the grant or incident to its nature, unrevoked and undiminished; in short, that these privileges and faculties shall continue while the corporation endures, of the same extent and of the specific quality as when originally conferred, without any hindrance, impediment or molestation, on the part of the grantor. The implied covenants of the grant are just as strong and obligatory as those covenants of title in an ordinary bargain and sale that go to tie up the hands of the bargainor himself, and of all claiming under him or acting by his authority. For instance: the covenants against incumbrances, &c., and for quiet enjoyment, without the let, molestation, hindrance, &c., of the bargainor, &c. The granted liberties and franchises cannot be destroyed or taken away, in the whole or in part; consequently, they cannot be altered or diminished in kind or in degree; for he who has a discretion to alter or diminish, necessarily has a discretion to destroy, unless the limits of his discretion be stipulated in the grant. It is not the mere quantum of the injury to the grantee, nor the degree in which the terms and conditions of the contract are transgressed, that determines the rightfulness of the act. Once admit a discretionary power in any degree as resulting from the relation of the parties and not from the limitations of the contract, and it can be nothing but an unlimited discretion. The granted liberties and faculties cannot be afterwards clogged with any new conditions or incumbrances that may either stop or retard their action; neither a mole-hill nor a mountain can be raised in their path. This is the irresistible 556] ible and universal conclusion of reason; and sanctioned, if it wanted sanction, by the reasoning and the decision of this court in Green v. Biddle (8 Wheat., 84).

Then, is not the exaction of a tax, or, in other words, of an additional compensation to the State for the chartered liberty, as efficient an instrument, either for the destruction or the diminution of the liberty as any that could be devised? What is there that could more effectually stop or retard its chartered course? It depends entirely upon the weight of the burden whether the party on whom it is imposed sink under it or be measurably impeded and retarded. In mercantile language, it may occasion a partial loss of one per cent., or a total loss of one hundred per cent.; and, in principle, does it matter which? The question is not whether the tax be exorbitant or oppressive. Of that no judicative tribunal can possibly be the judge. If the discretion to tax at all rest with the Legislature, the discretion is, in the nature of things, unlimited. It is impossible for any but the delegated depositaries of the power to tax, and their constituents to judge and determine what tax is reasonable or exorbitant. What might be a light burden to one bank might overwhelm another. Once determine that a discretionary power to impose the burden in any degree exists, and the judicial power is forever gone to control it in any degree.

Then these postulates may be taken for granted.

1. That the imposition of a new tax or burden on the liberty, in any degree, measurably clogs and impedes the practical exercise of that liberty, and so diminishes it.

2. That such tax or burden is an instrument equally efficient to destroy as to diminish the liberty, according to the kind and degree of force with which the instrument is used.

3. That it rests in the absolute discretion of the Legislature to use it, either for the one purpose or the other, if at all.

The conclusion is inevitable that, if it may be used at all, the exercise of the liberty in any degree and its very existence, rest upon sovereign discretion, not on the faith of a contract. This amounts either to a negation of the postulate with which we set out that the grant of the liberty is in the nature of a contract, [*557 or to an exclusion of all contracts from the sanction and protection of the Constitution; or to an exception of this particular contract from the condition of contracts in general.

The ground or reason of such exception is not stated, and is altogether beyond comprehension.

Then, if the law of 1822 be borne out in the imposition of this new burden on the liberty to exercise the privileges of the franchise, the change effected in the state or condition of the franchise as it stood under the original law of the contract and as it stands under the subsequent modification of that law, is this: originally, the contract under which it was held was consummate and executed; now, one, at least, of its most material terms—the consideration—is executory and contingent, and, what is worse, discretionary with the other party: originally, the exercise of the franchise within its chartered limits was absolutely free and unrestrained; now, burdened with new impositions, and liable to be further burdened, ad infinitum: originally, the liberty and right so to exercise the privileges and faculties of the franchise were absolute, unconditional, and indefeasible; now, at the sovereign will and pleasure of the Legislature.

The franchise is not like the proper subjects of political power intrusted to legislative discretion at all; but, to the positive sanction of public faith, tied down by the inviolable obligation of contract. Indeed, an abuse of legislative power in oppressing the great mass of the community by exorbitant taxation, far less in confiscating all its property, is scarce an admissible supposition. The mass of the community holds in its own hands the remedy against its own oppression and the abuses of its rulers; but the great conservative principle of political responsibility may act very feebly, or not at all, in protecting and enforcing the particular rights and obligations of contracts against violation by the government. It is, therefore, that political rights and the vested rights of contract and property, are placed on different bases and protected by different sanctions. The administration of any political power must, in the nature of things, be more or less discretionary; and can give no guarantee against abuse but the responsibility inseparable from delegated power; the rights [*558 and obligations of contracts, on the other hand, are no subjects of political trust or discretion at all, but just as positive and coercive upon the party that happens to be a sovereign State as upon an individual.

An objection somewhat novel is started, which goes to limit and restrict instead of enlarging State power, by denying its competency to make such a contract as we say it has made in this case. The State cannot, it seems, alienate or part with its sovereign power in whole or in part. Taxation is an incident of its highest sovereign power, and cannot be aliened by contract; therefore, a contract to exempt any particular person or species of property from taxation is void.

To say nothing of the evident inconsequence of the conclusion from the premises, and of the inaccuracy of holding that the constitutional incompetency of a State to lay new exactions upon its own contracts and upon the mere abstract rights of contract created by the State itself, is the same thing as a substantive stipulation to exempt property, in its nature an appropriate and legitimate subject of taxation; we may wonder why the axe was not applied to the root of the bank charter. For, surely, the principle of the objection goes that length: since the franchise itself is carved out of the eminent domain, or transcendental propriety of the State; and is a portion of it, aliened and bestowed upon every corporation; and no small portion of it is parted with when municipal corporations are created.

But it should not have escaped the learned counsel that the State Legislature of New Jersey was held bound by a contract of its predecessor, the colonial Legislature divesting itself of a portion of this very incident of high sovereignty—taxation—as it applied to certain lands belonging to citizens of the State, and constituting as appropriate a subject of taxation in general as can be imagined. This, not as he supposes, because of any peculiar dignity or sanctity attached to a treaty half a century before, between the former colony and the poor remnant of a broken tribe of Indians, but upon the ground of contract simply: which, indeed, is the only intelligible ground for the obligation 559 of treaties, *upon the parties to them. It might also have been recollected that the Legislature of New Jersey, in the instance just stated, and of Georgia, in the case of the Yazoo lands, were held to have conclusively renounced by contract, and by its implied, not its express stipulations, the exercise of one of the highest and most indispensable prerogatives of legislation—that of repealing its own laws.

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered in the highest court for the State of Rhode Island, in an action of trespass brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant.

In November, 1791, the Legislature of Rhode Island granted a charter of incorporation to certain individuals who had associated themselves together for the purpose of forming a banking company. They are incorporated by the name of “The President, Directors, and Company of the Providence Bank,” and have the ordinary powers which are supposed to be necessary for the usual objects of such associations.

In 1822 the Legislature of Rhode Island passed “an Act imposing a duty on licensed persons and others, and bodies corporate within the State,” in which, among other things, it is enacted that there shall be paid, for the use of the State, by each and every bank within the State, except The Bank of the United States, the sum of fifty cents on each and every thousand dollars of the capital stock actually paid in.” This tax was afterwards augmented to one dollar and twenty-five cents.

The Providence Bank, having determined to resist the payment of this tax, brought an action of trespass against the officers by whom a warrant of distress was issued against and served upon the property of the bank, in pursuance of the law. The defendants justify the taking set out in the declaration under the Act of Assembly imposing the tax; to which plea the plaintiffs demur, and assign for cause of demurrer that the act is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it impairs the obligation of the contract created by their charter of incorporation. Judgment ^{*}was [*560] given by the Court of Common Pleas in favor of the defendants; which judgment was, on appeal, confirmed by the Supreme Judicial Court of the State. That judgment has been brought before this court by a writ of error.

It has been settled that a contract entered into between a State and an individual is as fully protected by the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution as a contract between two individuals, and it is not denied that a charter incorporating a bank is a contract. Is this contract impaired by taxing the banks of the State?

This question is to be answered by the charter itself.

It contains no stipulation promising exemption from taxation. The State, then, has made no express contract which has been impaired by the act of which the plaintiffs complain. No words have been found in the charter which, in themselves, would justify the opinion that the power of taxation was in the view of either of the parties, and that an exemption of it was intended, though not expressed. The plaintiffs find great difficulty in showing that the charter contains a promise, either express or implied, not to tax the bank. The elaborate and ingenious argument which has been urged, amounts, in substance, to this: The charter authorizes the bank to employ its capital in banking transactions for the benefit of the stockholders. It binds the State to permit these transactions for this object. Any law arresting directly the operations of the bank would violate this obligation, and would come within the prohibition of the Constitution. But, as that cannot be done circuitously which may not be done directly, the charter restrains the State from passing any act which may indirectly destroy the profits of the bank. A power to tax the bank may unquestionably be carried to such an excess as to take all its profits, and still more than its profits for the use of the State; and, consequently, destroy the institution. Now, whatever may be the rule of expediency, the constitutionality of a measure depends not on the degree of its exercise, but on its principle. A power, therefore, which may in effect destroy the charter, is inconsistent with it; and is impliedly renounced by granting it. Such a power cannot be exercised without impairing ^{*}the obligation of the [*561] contract. When pushed to its extreme point, or exercised in moderation, it is the same power, and is hostile to the rights granted by the charter. This is substantially the argument for the bank. The plaintiffs cite and rely on several sentiments expressed on various occasions by this court in support of these positions.

The claim of the Providence Bank is certainly of the first impression. The power of taxing moneyed corporations has been frequently exercised, and has never before, so far as is known, been resisted. Its novelty, however, furnishes no conclusive argument against it.

That the taxing power is of vital importance; that it is essential to the existence of government; are truths which it cannot be necessary to re-affirm. They are acknowledged and asserted by all. It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed. We will not say that a State may not relinquish it; that a consideration sufficiently valuable to induce a partial release of it may not exist: but as the whole community is interested in retaining it undiminished, that community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon it does not appear.

The plaintiffs would give to this charter the same construction as if it contained a clause exempting the bank from taxation on its stock in trade. But can it be supposed that such a clause would not enlarge its privileges? They contend that it must be implied, because the power to tax may be so wielded as to defeat the purpose for which the charter was granted. And may not this be said with equal truth of other legislative powers? Does it not also apply with equal force to every incorporated company? A company may be incorporated for the purpose of trading in goods as well as trading in money. If the policy of the State should lead to the imposition of a tax on unincorporated companies, could those which might be incorporated claim an exemption in virtue of a charter which does not indicate such an intention? The time may come when 562 a duty may be imposed on *manufacturers. Would an incorporated company be exempted from this duty as the mere consequence of its charter?

The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collective and changing body of men. This capacity is always given to such a body. Any privileges which may exempt it from the burthens common to individuals do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist.

If the power of taxation is inconsistent with the charter because it may be so exercised as to destroy the object for which the charter is given, it is equally inconsistent with every other charter, because it is equally capable of working the destruction of the objects for which every other charter is given. If the grant of a power to trade in money to a given amount implies an exemption of the stock in trade from taxation because the tax may absorb all the profits, then the grant of any other thing implies the same exemption; for that thing may be taxed to an extent which will render it totally unprofitable to the grantee.

Land, for example, has in many, perhaps in all the States, been granted by government since the adoption of the Constitution. This grant is a contract, the object of which is that the profits issuing from it shall enure to the benefit of the grantee. Yet the power of taxation may be carried so far as to absorb these profits. Does this impair the obligation of the contract? The idea is rejected by all; and the proposition appears so extravagant that it is difficult to admit any resemblance in the cases. And yet if the proposition for which the plaintiffs contend be true, it carries us to this point. That proposition is, that a power which is in itself capable of being exerted to the total destruction of the grant, is inconsistent with the grant; and is, therefore, impliedly relinquished by the grantor, though the language of the instrument contains no allusion to the subject. If this be an abstract truth, it may be supposed universal. But it is not universal, and therefore its truth cannot be admitted in these broad terms in any case. We must look for the exemption in the language of the instrument; and if we do *not find it there, it would [*563] be going very far to insert it by construction.

The power of legislation, and consequently of taxation, operates on all the persons and property belonging to the body politic. This is an original principle, which has its foundation in society itself. It is granted by all, for the benefit of all. It resides in government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved when property of any description, or the right to use it in any manner, is granted to individuals or corporate bodies. However absolute the right of an individual may be, it is still in the nature of that right that it must bear a portion of the public burdens, and that portion must be determined by the Legislature. This vital power may be abused; but the Constitution of the United States was not intended to furnish the corrective for every abuse of power which may be committed by the State governments. The interest, wisdom, and justice of the representative body, and its relations with its constituents, furnish the only security where there is no express contract against unjust and excessive taxation, as well as against unwise legislation generally. This principle was laid down in the case of M'Culloch v. The State of Maryland, and in Osborn et al. v. The Bank of the United States. Both those cases, we think, proceeded on the admission that an incorporated bank, unless its charter shall express the exemption, is no more exempted from taxation than an unincorporated company would be, carrying on the same business.

The case of Fletcher v. Peck has been cited; but in that case the Legislature of Georgia passed an act to annul its grant. The case of The State of New Jersey v. Wilson has been also mentioned; but in that case the stipulation exempting the land from taxation was made in express words.

The reasoning of the court in the case of M'Culloch v. The State of Maryland has been applied to this case, but the court itself appears to have provided against this application. Its opinion in that case, as well as in Osborn et al. v. The Bank of the United States, was founded expressly on the supremacy of the laws of Congress, and the necessary consequence of that supremacy to exempt its instruments employed *in the execution of its powers from the [*564] operation of any interfering power whatever. In reasoning on the argument that the power of taxation was not confined to the people and property of a State, but might be exercised on every object brought within its jurisdiction, this court admitted the truth of the proposition; and added, that "the power was an in-ident of sovereignty, and was co-extensive with that to which it was an incident. All powers, the court said, over which the sovereign power of a State extends, are subjects of taxation. The sovereignty of a State extends to everything which exists by its own authority, or is introduced by its permission; but does it extend to those means which are employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred on that body by the people of the United States? We think not.

So in the case of Osborn v. The Bank of the United States, the court said, "the argument" in favor of the right of the State to tax the bank, "supposes the corporation to have been originated for the management of an individual concern, to be founded upon contract between individuals, having private trade and private profit for its great end and principal object.

If these premises were true, the conclusion drawn from them would be inevitable. This mere private corporation, engaged in its own business, would certainly be subject to the taxing power of the State as any individual would be."

The court was certainly not discussing the question whether a tax imposed by a State on a bank chartered by itself impaired the obligation of its contract, and these opinions are not conclusive as they would be had they been delivered in such a case, but they show that the question was not considered as doubtful, and that inferences drawn from general expressions Peters 4.

pointed to a different subject cannot be correctly drawn.

We have reflected seriously on this case, and are of opinion that the Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island passed in 1822, imposing a duty on licensed persons and others, and bodies corporate within the State, does not impair the obligation of the contract created by the charter granted to the *plaintiffs in error. It [*565 is therefore the opinion of this court that there is no error in the judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court for the State of Rhode Island affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court in this case, and the same is affirmed; and the cause is remanded to the said Supreme Judicial Court, that its judgment may be finally entered.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of Rhode Island and Providence plantations, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by this court, that the judgment of the said Supreme Judicial Court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed with costs.

ABBREVIATIONS.

F. C. appended to a citation from the regular reports of the U. S. Circuit and District Courts refers to the series of reprints called the Federal Cases and gives, as its publishers do and recommend, the number of the case in that series.

Fed. Cas. is used when the case is contained in the series of Federal Cases but is not reported in the regular series of U. S. Circuit and District Court Reports, and the citation of such cases is to the volume and page of Fed. Cas., not to the number of the case.

Fed. or Fed. Rep. refers to the well known series Federal Reporter, containing reports of the Circuit and District Court decisions since 1880.

L. R. A. will be readily recognized as the abbreviation for the Lawyers' Reports Annotated, and particular attention should be given to these citations, as in a large proportion of cases the citing case will be found accompanied by a note on its principal point absolutely exhaustive of the authorities thereon.

Am. Dec., Am. Rep. and Am. St. Rep. will be readily recognized as the abbreviations for the well known trinity of selected case reports, The American Decisions, American Reports and American State Reports.

Pennsylvania State Reports (Pa. St.) The New Jersey Law Reports (N. J. L.) and Equity Reports (N. J. Eq.) are distinguished by the number of the series, not by the name of the reporter, while the North and South Carolina Reports, Law and Equity, are cited by the name of the reporter where the reports are so titled and it has been the universal custom.

Duplicate citations are given to the National Reporter System where cases are therein contained, and to the Reporter System alone of cases not, at the date of the preparation of the annotation, officially reported. The usual abbreviations are used, as follows:

Atl. Atlantic Reporter,
Pac. Pacific Reporter,
N. E. Northeastern Reporter,
N. W. Northwestern Reporter,

So. Southern Reporter,
S. E. Southeastern Reporter,
S. W. Southwestern Reporter,
S. Ct. Supreme Court Reporter.

We think that in all other respects the abbreviations used are clear and familiar to all who are accustomed to the use of legal reports and text books.

App. 111, and Pittsburgh, etc., Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 82 Fed. 728, 54 U. S. App. 236, holding exception to charge too general; Commonwealth v. Costley, 118 Mass. 23, holding bill of exceptions should not set forth the whole charge to the jury, as also in Curry v. Porter, 125 Mass. 94, and Oliver v. Phelps, 20 N. J. L. 185, ruling similarly; Kearney v. Snodgrass, 12 Or. 317, 7 Pac. 313, holding an exception in general terms to an instruction correct in point of law cannot avail a party on appeal; dissenting opinion, People v. Berlin, 10 Utah, 43, 36 Pac. 200, majority holding a general exception to an entire charge is insufficient, if any portion is correct; as also in People v. Hart, 10 Utah, 206, 37 Pac. 331, collecting authorities. Cited but without particular application in Smith v. United States, 1 Wash. Ter. 272. Denied in dissenting opinion, Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 146, 14 L. 89, majority holding in some States it is the practice for the court to express its opinion upon facts in a charge to the jury, and it is proper for Circuit Courts of such States to do likewise.

Appeal and error.—Appellate court is not concerned with trial judge's charge to jury upon matters of fact, p. 80.

Cited and rule applied as follows: Garrard v. Reynolds, 4 How. 127, 11 L. 905, holding in submitting an open question of fact, the court did not interfere with province of the jury; Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S. 659, 25 L. 491, refusing to reverse judgment, where defendant did not request the instruction to be qualified or changed; Vicksburg, etc., R. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. Deeds.—Under law of New York, the oath of a subscribing witness, and subsequent recording of the deed, afford prima facie evidence of its execution and delivery, p. 82.

Cited to this point and statement reaffirmed in Kelly v. Jackson, 6 Pet. 632, 8 L. 527. Cited and principle applied in Hanrick v. Neely, 10 Wall. 366, 19 L. 948, holding grantee being in possession of a recorded deed, upon its face regularly executed, presumption is it was duly delivered; McIntyre v. Kamm, 12 Or. 259, 7 Pac. 29, in making proof of an unacknowledged deed, witness should be sworn, and this fact should be in the certificate.

Distinguished in Holbrook v. Bank, 2 Curt. 247, F. C. 6,597, holding in Massachusetts certificate of acknowledgment and registration of deed do not estop a person from proving both deed and certificate were fraudulently antedated.

Estoppel.—Recital of a lease in a deed of release binds the parties and privies but does not bind strangers or those claiming by title paramount to the deed, p. 83.

The citations collect a very large number of cases affirming and applying this doctrine. They are in part as follows: Crane v. Morris, 6 Pet. 609, 610, 612, 8 L. 518, 519, applying rule to similar facts; Sprigg v. Bank, 10 Pet. 265, 9 L. 419, holding one signing as principal cannot set up defense that he was a surety; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 323, 13 L. 714, holding grantee and those claiming under him cannot deny that grantor had an estate in fee simple when deed purports to convey such; Bush v. Cooper, 18 How. 85, 15 L. 274, holding one mortgaging land subject to judgment lien (deed containing covenant of warranty), afterwards becoming a bankrupt, is estopped from setting up title acquired at sale to satisfy judgment, and defeat mortgage; Johnson v. United States, 5 Mason, 442, F. C. 7,419, holding receipt of a collector of United States is but prima facie evidence of payment; Murray v. Lovejoy, 2 Cliff. 202, F. C. 9,963, holding attaching creditor appearing and defending in suit against sheriff respecting the attachment is bound by judgment therein upon a subsequent suit for trespass; Reeves v. Vinacke, 1 McCrary, 216, F. C. 11,663, holding purchaser of land, assuming to pay mortgage, defective because of description, is estopped to claim as an innocent purchaser; Kirby v. Lewis, 39 Fed. 70, holding parol evidence inadmissible to vary recitals in a deed; Pratt v. Nixon, 91 Ala. 196, 8 So. 753, holding recital in second mortgage referring to the first estops mortgagor and second mortgagee from denying validity of first mortgage; Doe v. Porter, 3 Ark. 61, 36 Am. Dec. 455, holding grantor and grantee, and privies, are bound by recital of prior deed; Stidham v. Matthews, 29 Ark. 660, holding recitals of vendor's deed are notice to vendee; Roth v. Williams, 45 Ark. 449, holding one claiming under title anterior to date of reciting deeds, is not bound by their terms; Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 367, holding mere trespassers on land are strangers against whom recitals in the patent are conclusive; Donahue v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 418, 85 Am. Distinguished in Sabariego v. Maverick, 124 U. S. 283, 31 L. 439, 8 S. Ct. 473, holding deed will pass only such title as the government has, and there is no presumption that it is a valid title; O'Bannon v. Myer, 36 Ala. 553, 76 Am. Dec. 336, holding recital of a note in a mortgage given to secure its payment is an exception to this rule; Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 415, admitting evidence to show recital is not true, and was inserted through mistake; Douglass v. Scott, 5 Ohio, 199, holding deed not sufficiently attested does not operate as an estoppel. Distinguished in dissenting opinion, McCusker v. McEvey, 10 R. I. 611, without special application.

Evidence.—Recital of lease in a deed of release is admissible even in a suit against a stranger, as secondary proof, in the absence of more perfect evidence, to establish the contents of the lease, especially if the possession be a long one, pp. 83, 84.

The following citing cases have affirmed and relied upon this exception to the general rule, heretofore considered, in making the following holdings: Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 805, 18 L. 657, holding presumption being established, recitals in deed may be used as proof against strangers; Davis v. Gaines, 104 U. S. 398, 26 L. 762, holding where possession was held for sixty years, deed was competent evidence of due advertisement of sale; Fulkerson v. Holmes, 117 U. S. 399, 29 L. 919, 6 S. Ct. 785, admitting deed, after lapse of sixty years, to prove pedigree of son; Smith v. McIntire, 83 Fed. 467, after fifty years, every reasonable presumption as to existence of power will be indulged in favor of bona fide purchasers; McMurtry v. Keifner, 36 Neb. 525, 54 N. W. 845, holding recital in deed of recent date is not sufficient evidence, as against strangers, of death of ancestor; Schermerhorn v. Negus, 2 Hill, 337, holding recitals in an ancient deed are not evidence against a stranger; Chautauque Bank v. Riskey, 4 Den. 486, holding party is bound by recitals in deed, under which his grantor held; Jackson v. Deslonde, 1 Posey, 685, holding instruction, if you believe there were in existence more than thirty years ago, deeds from A. to B. and B. to C., and C. claimed said land, holding possession and paying taxes, you are authorized to presume said deeds were executed by A. and B., if a proper one. Cited, but without particular application of this doctrine, in Magee v. Doe, 22 Ala. 717, and Ferguson v. Dent, 8 Mo. 673.

Distinguished in Ives v. Ashley, 97 Mass. 205, where, there being no evidence to prove the execution and loss of a deed, the recital was inadmissible.

Estoppel.— State claiming title under a deed is subject to all the estoppels running with the title, p. 87.

Cited approvingly, but with no particular application, in Oxford Twp. v. Columbia, 38 Ohio St. 95.

Remainders.— Estates in remainder shall be construed to vest as soon as they may be, p. 92.

Cited and rule followed in Doe v. Considine, 6 Wall. 475, 478, 18 L. 874, 875, holding estates in remainder vest at the earliest period possible, unless there be a clear manifestation of intent to the contrary; Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 175, 22 L. 113, holding child took a vested estate; Mercantile Bank v. Ballard, 83 Ky. 491, 4 Am. St. Rep. 166, holding children took a vested remainder; as also in Williamson v. Field, 2 Sandf. Ch. 561.

Marriage settlements.— Acts of parent under, cannot affect the validity of the rights of the children once vested, p. 93.

Cited and applied in Magniac v. Thompson, 1 Bald. 363, F. C. 8,956, holding omission of trustee under marriage settlement, did not affect the cestui que trust.

Powers.— In deeds under power to sell recital of the power is unnecessary, p. 98.

Cited and applied in Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 286, 11 Am. St. Rep. 427, 5 S. E. 42, holding deed made by an executor as an individual will execute a power of sale, though deed make no reference to power.

Damages.— Party is not in all cases bound to pay for improvements on his land, made against his will, p. 101.

Cited and applied in Newton v. Thornton, 3 N. Mex. 210, 5 Pac. 259, one making improvements upon land of another is not entitled to compensation. Cited, arguendo, in Tufts v. Tufts, 3 Wood. & M. 512, F. C. 14,233.

Miscellaneous.— Citation in Westbrooke v. Romeyn, 1 Bald. 203, F. C. 17,428, is to argument of counsel; State v. Patton, 5 Ired. 185, and State v. Floyd, 13 Ired. 385, as to force of prima facie evidence.

Mandamus.— The writ will lie to compel a judge to sign and settle a bill of exceptions, although not to control his discretion as to the frame of the bill, p. 106.

The following cases upon this point are collected by the citations: In re Streep, 156 U. S. 208, 39 L. 399, 15 S. Ct. 358, refusing to issue writ of mandamus requiring circuit judge to resettle bill of exceptions; Hudson v. Parker, 156 U. S. 288, 39 L. 428, 15 S. Ct. 454, holding writ of mandamus will issue to compel district judge to admit to bail, where he has not exercised any discretion in the matter, but has declined to act at all; People v. Pearson, 2 Scam. 204, 33 Am. Dec. 448, granting mandamus to compel judge to sign bill of exceptions as originally presented to him; People v. Jameson, 40 Ill. 96, 89 Am. Dec. 338, judge cannot, by mandamus, be compelled to sign bill of exceptions, which he believes incorrect; People v. Anthony, 129 Ill. 223, 21 N. E. 781, holding judge cannot, by mandamus, be forced to sign an amended bill of exceptions at a subsequent term, when he is unable to determine that exceptions were in fact taken on the trial; Halstead v. Brown, 17 Ind. 203, holding no other judge than the one who tried the cause can correct a bill of exceptions; Ketcham v. Hill, 42 Ind. 68, holding successor to judge presiding at trial has power to sign a bill of exceptions; Jelley v. Roberts, 50 Ind. 7, holding mandamus lies to compel a judge to sign a bill of exceptions; Shepard v. Peyton, 12 Kan. 618, holding judge cannot, by mandamus, be forced to sign a bill of exceptions which he believes untrue; State v. Todd, 4 Ohio, 352, discharging mandamus where bill of exceptions was incorrect; as also Vanvabry v. Staton, 88 Tenn. 341, 12 S. W. 788, and Douglass v. Loomis, 5 W. Va. 545, 546, where judge under oath denied its correctness; Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 427, holding mandamus lies to compel judge to settle and sign bill; State v. Noggle, 13 Wis. 382, holding judge will not be compelled by mandamus to insert instructions in a bill, when he returns he has already settled it; State v. Kellogg, 95 Wis. 679, 70 N. W. 302, holding board, if facts are undisputed, may be compelled by mandamus to revoke a license.

Denied in dissenting opinion, Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 219, 8 L. 103, majority holding Supreme Court has power by mandamus to command Circuit Court to sign a bill of exceptions.

Practice.— Bill of exceptions should be tendered at trial, and can only be signed after the term with consent of parties, or by special order of judge, p. 107.

The following citing cases affirm and apply the foregoing rule: Sheppard v. Wilson, 6 How. 275, 12 L. 436, holding where bill of exceptions was signed two years after the trial, the Supreme Court of Iowa were right in striking it out of the record; Turner v. Yates, 16 How. 29, 14 L. 831, holding record must show exception was taken at that stage of the trial, when its cause arose; Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 358, 26 L. 117, holding where bills of exceptions are signed during the term, it is not necessary that they be antedated to time of trial; Davis v. Patrick, 122 U. S. 143, 30 L. 1092, 7 S. Ct. 1103, refusing to strike out bill of exceptions, where signature was delayed until term succeeding trial, through fault of judge; United States v. Jarvis, 3 Wood. & M. 225, F. C. 15,469, declaring record must show exception was made at time of trial; Nicoll v. Insurance Co., 3 Wood. & M. 537, F. Manufacturing Co.*, 86 Md. 606, 39 Atl. 315, holding bill validly signed within the time fixed by order; Commonwealth v. Greenlaw, 119 Mass. 209, holding application for an extension of time not having been made before adjournment of term, bills, though filed three days after verdict, cannot be allowed; V. & M. R. R. Co. v. Ragsdale, 51 Miss. 454, by agreement the bill may be settled and signed during vacation; Williams v. Ramsey, 52 Miss. 858, holding it error where bill was signed in vacation; Consaul v. Lidell, 7 Mo. 256, holding successor to trial judge had no right to sign bill of exceptions without consent of opposite party, under the statute; Pomeroy v. Selmes, 8 Mo. 732, holding bill of exceptions cannot be signed at a subsequent term of the court without the consent of the other party; Law v. Merrills, 6 Wend. 278, holding bill of exceptions must appear on its face to have been taken and signed at trial of cause; Ah' Lep v. Gong Choy, 13 Or. 210, 9 Pac. 485, holding bill should be tendered immediately after trial, but settlement may be made within a reasonable time; as also in Ferrell v. Alder, 2 Swan, 79, ruling similarly; Clark v. Lary, 3 Sneed, 80, refusing to notice bill filed out of term time; McGavock v. Puryear, 6 Cold. 37, also so holding, Mallon v. Tucker M. Co., 7 Lea, 66, holding rule, that bill of exceptions be presented within fifteen days after verdict, is not unlawful or unreasonable; Nadenbousch v. Sharer, 2 W. Va. 295, declaring exceptions ought to be taken before the jury retires. Cited approvingly in Brown v. Clarke, 4 How. 15, 11 L. 855, without special application; note, 8 Blackf. 575, on this topic; dissenting opinion, State v. Withrow, 135 Mo. 385, 36 S. W. 1038, discussing statute limiting time of preparing bill of exceptions.

Distinguished in Woods v. Lindvall, 48 Fed. 73, 4 U. S. App. 49, holding bill of exceptions may be allowed and filed at the term when the motion for a new trial is finally acted on, even though such action is taken at a term subsequent to the entry of judgment.

Bills and notes.—Letter describing a bill of exchange so its identity could not be mistaken, and promising to accept it, if shown to one who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, is a binding acceptance, p. 121.

Cited and rule applied as follows: Scudder v. Bank, 91 U. S. 414, 23 L. 249, holding a parol promise to accept a bill is an acceptance thereof; Cassel v. Dows, 1 Blatchf. 340, 341, 342, F. C. 2,502, holding where letter is a general authority to draw, writer cannot be held as acceptor; Russell v. Wiggin, 2 Story, 237, 240, F. C. 12,165, under facts similar to main case; Bayard v. Lathy, 2 McLean, 464, F. C. 1,131, holding an authority to draw several bills of exchange, payable at specified periods, is an acceptance to one taking bills on the credit of such an authority; State Nat. Bank v. Young, 5 McCrary, 14, 14 Fed. 890, where draft was not described in unmistakable terms; Garrettson v. Bank, 39 Fed. 167, 7 L. R. A. 431, and n., to telegram asking if A. would pay F.'s check for $22,000, reply "T. is good. Send on your paper" held an acceptance; Smith v. Ledyard, 49 Ala. 282, holding one acting on faith of letter of credit, not actually shown him, may sue for a refusal to accept; Nelson v. Bank, 48 Ill. 39, 40, 95 Am. Dec. 512, 513, allowing action for breach of promise to accept; Carrollton Bank v. Tayleur, 16 La. 499, 35 Am. Dec. 222, holding a general authority to draw bills will not enable a purchaser to charge drawee upon an implied promise to accept; Franklin Bank v. Lynch, 52 Md. 279, 36 Am. Rep. 377, holding telegram did not amount to an acceptance of a certain draft; Murdock v. Mills, 11 Met. 10, holding party not liable where agent's authority to show bills was special, and he exceeded it; Exchange Bank v. Rice, 98 Mass. 292, 293, holding a promise to accept a bill, contained in a letter after bill has been negotiated, will not authorize writer to be sued as acceptor; Bissell v. Lewis, 4 Mich. 459, holding letter to be an unconditional acceptance; Overman v. Bank, 30 N. J. L. 69, holding it essential that holder took bill on the faith of the promise; Ulster Bank v. McFarlan, 3 Den. 557, holding that the promise to accept must describe bill unmistakably; Lonsdale v. Bank, 18 Ohio, 140, holding action could not be maintained against parties as acceptors, but merely for a breach of promise to accept. Cited in note, 28 Am. Rep. 347, on this topic, collecting authorities; note, 2 Gall. 239, F. C. 10,860, collecting authorities; dissenting opinion, Talmadge v. Williams, 27 La. Marine insurance.—Before abandonment is accepted by insurer it may be waived by the insured; and such waiver is generally a question of intention for the jury, p. 143.

An abandonment, if legally made, puts the underwriter completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the latter becomes the agent of the former, p. 144.

Cited and applied in Copeland v. Security Ins. Co., Woolw. 286, F. C. 3,210, declaring the act operating as an abandonment should be decisive; Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Bakewell, 4 B. Mon. 544, Hooper v. Whitney, 19 La. 271, holding abandonment puts the insurer in place of the assured; Natchez Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 2 Smedes & M. 378, 379, 41 Am. Dec. 597, 598, declaring that master and mariners are agents of the owner of the cargo, as well as the owners of the vessel, hence a deviation by them discharges insurance on cargo.

Distinguished in Clark v. Wilson, 103 Mass. 227, 4 Am. Rep. 538, deciding that holders of a bill of sale of vessel intended as a mortgage may maintain action for conversion, notwithstanding they abandoned.

Abandonment.— Acts of ownership by owner may amount to relinquishment of an unaccepted abandonment, p. 144.

Cited to this point in Gloucester Ins. Co. v. Younger, 2 Curt. 337, F. C. 5,487, holding if underwriter takes possession and repairs vessel, this amounts to an acceptance of the abandonment.

Abandonment.— Offer by professed agent of underwriters to pay expenses, does not terminate unaccepted abandonment, p. 146.

Cited, Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Bakewell, 4 B. Mon. 557, insurers taking abandoned boat, presumably acted as insurers only.

Assignment to secure a bona fide debt, is not rendered fraudulent because vessel assigned, being at sea, is not actually delivered, p. 150.

Assignment of cargo is not invalidated as against innocent creditors, by failure to deliver the bills of lading, p. 151.

Under collection act of 1799, United States acquires no lien by reason of unpaid duty bonds, that would defeat assignment of subsequent imports by same consignees, p. 151.

A private act of incorporation cannot affect rights of non-assenting individuals, and is quoad hoc, a contract, p. 167.

Corporate powers are strictly limited to those conferred, p. 168.

The citing cases collect a number of authorities upon this doctrine. They are in part as follows: Dissenting opinion, United States v. Robertson, 5 Pet. 666, 672, 8 L. 266, 268, construing a bond executed by president and directors of a bank to the United States; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 546, 559, 9 L. 824, 828, declaring that in public grants nothing passes by implication; Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 319, 12 L. 455, where bank was chartered with power among others "to discount bills and notes," a law passed forbidding it to transfer by indorsement any note or bill is unconstitutional; Missionary Society v. Dalles, 107 U. S. 342, 27 L. 547, 2 S. Ct. 677, holding under act of 1848 a religious society acquired title only to such lands then actually occupied as a missionary station; Alabama R. R. Co. v. Jones, 5 N. B. Reg. 105, 1 Fed. Cas. 278, holding provision in charter authorizing corporation "to manufacture materials for its equipment" does not constitute it a manufacturer; Pullan v. Railroad, 4 Biss. 41, F. C. 11,461, holding authority to mortgage its "road, income and other property," does not authorize a mortgage of its franchise; Minturn v. Larue, McAll. 375, F. C. 9,646, declaring that no powers will be construed to have been given by implication in a franchise, unless of a direct character; Sumner v. Marcy, 3 Wood. & M. 112, F. C. 13,609, holding corporation chartered for manufacturing cannot engage in banking; Wheeling v. Baltimore, 1 Hughes, 98, F. Evidence.—In action respecting tax title official tax books made up by the register who had power to correct the valuations of the assessor are evidence of assessment of tax, and it is not required that assessors' original list be produced, p. 359.

Cited and rule followed in Haley v. Elliott, 20 Colo. 389, 38 Pac. 775, holding since treasurer's books were the final repository of the work of assessment and levy of taxes, they are prima facie evidence of taxes so levied; Fitch v. Pinckard, 4 Scam. 76, admitting original minutes of board of trustees, where book into which they had been transcribed was lost; Painter v. Hall 75 Ind. 213, holding assessment lists are competent evidence to show amount of value owned by the assessed; Commonwealth v. Hefron, 102 Mass. 151, holding records of assessors are inadmissible in suits against third parties; dissenting opinion, Morton v. Reeds, 6 Mo. 89, 93, majority holding certificate of auditor, stating that provisions of the law have been complied with, is no evidence of that fact; Moore v. State Bank, 6 Mo. 380, holding protest of notary, stating note was presented for payment, is evidence of that fact; Austin v. King, 97 N. C. 343, 2 S. E. 679, admitting tax list to show one of the parties had paid taxes before there was any controversy.

Evidence—Officers de facto.—Proof of the regular appointment of the assessors is unnecessary, if they have acted under the authority of the corporation, p. 359.

Cited and applied in Moore v. Turner, 43 Ark. 250, and Barton v. Lattourette, 55 Ark. 83, 17 S. W. 588, holding official character of assessor cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding; Sterling v. Warden, 51 N. H. 241, 12 Am. Rep. 104, holding where postmaster, upon appointment, had taken oath, it is presumed he had complied with all the requirements of the law; State v. Roberts, 52 N. H. 495, declaring that an individual has acted notoriously as a public officer is prima facie evidence of his official character.

Tax sale.—Interest of tenants in common may be assessed separately, and the share of one may be sold for unpaid taxes, p. 361.

W. 1059, holding it was not necessary that summons should be published at regular intervals of seven days; State v. Mining Co., 5 Nev. 425, 434, holding it was not necessary for call to be published twenty-one days before election, but that three insertions at any time in three successive weeks were sufficient; Wood v. Knapp, 100 N. Y. 114, 2 N. E. 634, holding that it is sufficient if weekly publication is made on any day of each week; State v. Superior Court, 6 Wash. 357, 33 Pac. 829, holding six publications, one made once in each of the six consecutive weeks, is sufficient; Marling v. Robrecht, 13 W. Va. 467, holding service complete on fourth publication, though four weeks have not elapsed between dates of the first and last publication.

Distinguished in Hernandez v. His Creditors, 57 Cal. 334, holding, “at least once a week for four successive weeks,” in State statute require four publications not more than seven days apart; Finlayson v. Peterson, 5 N. Dak. 589, 57 Am. St. Rep. 586, 67 N. W. 954, 33 L. R. A. 534, holding under statute requiring advertisement “for six successive weeks at least once in each week,” the first publication must be made at least forty-two days before the sale.

Tax sale.—Where statute requires certain facts to be stated in the advertisement, failure to do so is not cured by giving actual notice in some other way, p. 362.

Cited, Patrick v. Davis, 15 Ark. 371, holding misdescription in advertisement invalidates sale, although a deed is delivered containing recitals of every prerequisite prescribed by the statute.

Tax sale is void for uncertainty where advertisement purported to sell “half” of lot No. 4, p. 362.

The citations collect the following similar cases, affirming and applying this ruling: Gault v. Woodbridge, 4 McLean, 332, F. C. 5,275, holding levy on one-half of a lot, without designating which half, is too indefinite to convey the title; Fitch v. Pinckard, 4 Scam. 81, 84, holding sale void for uncertainty in the description of the premises; Sloan v. Sewell, 81 Ind. 182, holding imperfect description of land will not preclude purchaser from enforcing lien against the land; Bosworth v. Farenholz, 3 Iowa, 88, holding deed purporting to convey forty feet of lot No. 2, fatally defective in its description; *Blair T. L. & L. Co. v. bank could not be impeached in action of ejectment because the act creating bank had been declared unconstitutional; Reed v. Wright, 2 G. Greene, 33, 37, holding judgments of courts of general jurisdiction cannot be collaterally impeached unless absolutely void on its face; Massey v. Scott, 49 Mo. 282, holding general judgment will authorize the issue of a special execution against the property attached and this informality cannot be taken advantage of in action of ejectment.

Practice.—As statute authorized service on unknown heirs by publication, only when complainant claimed as locator, or by a written instrument, and the complaint did not so claim, the decree was made without notice and was void, pp. 473, 475.

In the Federal courts the following have cited and relied upon this principle: Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How. 343, 14 L. 448, holding service insufficient where return did not show a compliance with statutory requirements; Nations v. Johnson, 24 How. 205, 16 L. 632, holding compliance with statutory requirements as to service by publication gave jurisdiction; Earle v. McVeigh, 91 U. 4 Pet. 480-510. 7 L. 927. SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION. ETC., v. TOWN OF PAWLET.

Pleading.—General issue pleaded to an action by a corporation, admits the competency of the plaintiff to sue, p. 501.

This principle is affirmed and applied in the following citing cases: Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 329, 24 L. 818, holding plea of non-assumpsit admits the existence of the corporation; Southern Express Co. v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 199, 25 L. 320, holding complainant need not prove its existence unless the fact is directly put in issue; Baltimore & P. R. R. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 137 U. S. 572, 34 L. 787, 11 S. Ct. 186, holding misnomer of a corporation waived by pleading to the merits; Michigan Ins. Bank v. Eldred, 143 U. S. 300, 36 L. 164, 12 S. Ct. 452, holding under Code of Wisconsin, an express denial, upon information and belief, that plaintiff is a corporation, puts in issue the existence of the corporation; New York Dry Dock v. Hicks, 5 McLean, 115, F. C. 10,204, holding corporation need not show the land was taken in the regular course of business; Oregonian Ry. Co. v. O. R. & N. Co., 10 Sawy. 476, 482, 23 Fed. 236, 239; Emerson Co. v. Nimocks, 88 Fed. 281, holding want of capacity of corporation to sue in a particular case must be pleaded in abatement; Union Cement Co. v. Noble, 15 Fed. 503, 504, 505, holding in Federal courts the existence of foreign and domestic corporations can only be denied by special plea; Imperial Refining Co. v. Wyman, 38 Fed. 576, 3 L. R. A. 505, and n., holding that a plea to jurisdiction denying averments of the diverse citizenship, must be, in the Federal courts of Ohio, by special plea of abatement; Hodges v. Kimball, 91 Fed. 848, holding plea to merits of general issue, in suit by administrator, admits plaintiff's capacity and right to sue; Jenks v. Edwards, 6 Ala. 145, holding where suit is brought in name of one person, for use of another, death of nominal plaintiff at commencement of suit may be pleaded in bar or abatement; Strickland v. Burns, 14 Ala. 513; Arnau v. First Nat. Bank, 36 Fla. 410, 18 So. 789; McIntire v. Preston, 5 Gilm. 59, 48 Am. Dec. 323, and Jones v. C. T. F. Co., 14 Ind. 92, all holding that general issue admits character in which plaintiff sues; as also Alderman, etc., v. Finley, 10 Ark. 426, 52 Am. Dec. 246; Savage Manuf. Co. v. Armstrong, 17 Me. 37, 35 Am. Dec. 228, and Garton v. Bank, 34 Mich. 280, to the same effect; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Eyser, 2 Colo. 156, holding that defendant suing as a corporation cannot deny its own existence; Phenix Bank v. Curtis, 14 Conn. 440, 441, 442, 36 Am. Dec. 494, 496, holding general issue admits capacity of foreign corporation to sue, but it does not admit their power to make the contract; Spangler v. Railway Co., 21 Ill. 277, by demurring defendant admits averment that plaintiff is a corporation; School District v. Blaisdell, 6 N. H. 198, holding plea of general issue admits that plaintiffs are a corporation with capacity to sue, as also in Overland Dis. Co. v. Wedeles, 1 N. Mex. 532; Methodist E. Church v. Wood, Wright, 13, S. C., 5 Ohio, 286; Rheem v. Wheel Co., 33 Pa. St. 364, and Boston T., etc., v. Spooner, 5 Vt. 96, all to the same effect; North Co. Bank v. Eyer, 60 Pa. St. 440, holding non-existence of plaintiff is pleadable in bar; Freeland v. Insurance Co., 94 Pa. St. 514, holding misnomer should be interposed by plea in abatement. Cited without particular application in United States v. Insurance Co., 22 Wall. 101, 22 L. 817; Pillsbury W. F. Co. v. Eagle, 86 Fed. 628, 41 L. R. A. 173, and Guaga Iron Co. v. Dawson, 4 Blackf. (Ind) 205.

Distinguished in Commissioners v. Perry, 5 Ohio, 61, where the individuals were treated as the plaintiffs by the officers of the court and both counsel; Lewis v. Bank of Kentucky, 12 Ohio, 149, 40 Am. Dec. 472, and Anderson v. Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 537, holding non-assumpsit puts in issue the capacity of plaintiff to sue; Girls Ind.

School v. Fritchey, 10 Mo. App. 349, under Code general denial puts in issue the incorporation of plaintiff, except in a few instances.

Corporation.—Charter of 1761 creating a town granting the “society” one share of the town recognizes their corporate existence and their capacity to take, p. 502.

Cited and applied in Koch v. Railway Co., 75 Md. 226, 23 Atl. 464, 15 L. R. A. 379, and n., holding where legislature by special act recognizes a corporation and authorizes it to exercise certain rights, all charter defects in original certificate are cured, as also in State v. Butler, 86 Tenn. 629, 8 S. W. 591. Cited without special application in San Antonio v. Odin, 15 Tex. 545.

Distinguished in State v. Lincoln Trust Co., 144 Mo. 595, 46 S. W. 601, holding mere recognition by legislature of powers not expressly granted to corporations, does not have the effect of creating authority in them to exercise such powers.

Adverse possession.—Ouster will not be presumed in favor of the possession of a mere intruder, p. 504.

Cited and applied in Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Pet. 355, 8 L. 153, holding one asserting an ouster must prove something more than a mere trespass; Harvey v. Tyler, 2 Wall. 349, 17 L. 876, holding occupation by one without claim of title is not adverse; Herbert v. Hanrick, 16 Ala. 596, holding a bona fide claim of title, asserted so notoriously as to charge vendor with notice, is sufficient to avoid deed of disseizee; Byers v. Danley, 27 Ark. 93, reciting requisites of adverse possession; Fain v. Garthright, 5 Ga. 14, holding possession, under a contract of purchase, with bonds for titles when the purchase money is paid, is adverse; Link v. Doefer, 42 Wis. 395, 24 Am. Rep. 420, holding a mere intruder may acquire title under tax deed adverse to former owner. Cited as authority for the proposition that legal seizin and possession which follows a title is co-extensive with the right and continues till owner is ousted by an actual adverse possession by the following: United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 743, 8 L. 566; Mitchel v. United States, 9 Pet. 735, 9 L. 292; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 456, 9 L. 1155; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 593, 49 Am. Rep. 105; Wiggins v. Holley, 11 Ind. 7, and Tush-Ho-Yo-Tubby v. Barr, 45 Miss. 193. Cited without particular application in Magill v. Brown, 16 Fed. Cas. 420.

Adverse possession.—Vendee, though deriving his title from vendor, holds adversely to him, and his entry is an ouster, p. 506.

Cited and principle applied as follows: Bradstreet v. Huntington, 5 Pet. 439, 440, 8 L. 184, holding that one in possession holding for himself, to the exclusion of all others, holds adversely to all, whatever may be their relation; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 54, 10 L. 885, holding that the relation of landlord and tenant in no sense exists between vendor and vendee, and latter may controvert former's title; Clymer v. Dawkins, 3 How. 690, 11 L. 786, and King v. Carmichael, 136 Ind. 27, 43 Am. St. Rep. 308, 35 N. E. 512, holding where tenant in common in possession claims it in severalty, the possession is adverse; Croxall v. Shererd, 5 Wall. 287, 18 L. 579, holding that purchaser holds adversely to all the world; Moore v. Greene, 2 Curt. 210, F. C. 9,763, holding guardian of complainant's mother having purchased from the administrator could set up the statute of limitations; Bybee v. Oregon & California R. R. Co., 11 Sawy. 486, 26 Fed. 591, holding vendee is not estopped, except in a few cases, to deny vendor's title; Ward v. Cochran, 71 Fed. 131, 36 U. S. App. 307, and Van Blarcom v. Kip, 26 N. J. L. 361, holding vendee of land in possession under parol contract holds adversely to his vendor from time purchase money is paid; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 476, 79 Am. Dec. 191, holding vendee may deny the title of his vendor, as also in Wenzel v. Schultz, 100 Cal. 255, 34 Pac. 698, ruling similarly; Sands v. Davis, 40 Mich. 20, holding purchaser of an undivided interest, entering as a stranger, may set up adverse claim that originated before his purchase; Morgan v. Hazlehurst Lodge, 53 Miss. 677, holding where parties derive title from a common source, either may show whether the title was legal or equitable; Macklot v. Dubreuil, 9 Mo. 485, 490, 43 Am. Dec. 554, 560, holding vendee may set up statute of limitations in bar of action by vendor, as also in Bradstreet v. Clarke, 12 Wend. 675; Coakley v. Perry, 3 Ohio St. 347; Ray v. Goodman, 1 Sneed, 592, and Core v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 244, all to same effect; Roseboom v. Van Vechten, 5 Den. 430, holding that adverse possession is not necessarily wrongful; People v. Van Rensselaer, 9 N. Y. 343, holding one entering unoccupied part of manorial grant, paying taxes and protecting it, holds adversely; Turner v. Smith, 11 Tex. 630, if cestui que trust repudiates the trust statute of limitations begins to run against vendor; Propagation v. Sharon, 28 Vt. 611, holding that possession of grantee, claiming by paramount right, is adverse; Clarke v. McClure, 10 Gratt. 311, 313, and Nowlin v. Reynolds, 25 Gratt. 142, holding vendee entering under executory contract, which leaves legal title in vendor, does not hold adversely. Cited, without particular application, in Jones v. Porter, 3 Peñr. & W. 135.

Constitutional law.—State legislature may deprive the plaintiff in ejectment of a right to recover mesne profits in that form of action, p. 509.

Cited and applied in Drehman v. Stifle, 8 Wall. 603, 19 L. 511, holding State legislature can pass retroactive laws, where there is no inhibition in the State Constitution, provided they do not impair the obligation of a contract, and are not ex post facto; *Hardeman v. Treaty.—When territory is acquired by treaty the property rights of its inhabitants will be protected, though not so stipulated in the contract treaty, pp. 511. 512.

Reaffirmed in Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 436, 9 L. 1147. Cited and principle applied in Eslava v. Doe, 7 Ala. 549, holding confirmation by act of Congress was but a disavowal of title in the United States; Knight v. United States Land Assn., 142 U. S. 184. 201, 35 L. 983, 988, 12 S. Ct. 265, 271, holding doctrine that on the acquisition of territory from Mexico, the United States acquired title to lands under tide-water in trust for future States, does not apply to land previously granted to other parties by the former government; Coburn v. San Mateo Co., 75 Fed. 528, holding that title to tide lands in California is in the State except where grants were made by Mexico before the cession; Reynolds v. West, 1 Cal. 326, holding grant by Mexican officer, before the acquisition of the country by the Americans, is protected by the law of nations; Teschemacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 23, 79 Am. Dec. 156, and Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 421, holding when California was ceded to the United States, the rights of its citizens remained unchanged; *May v. Constitutional law.—Contract between a State and an individual, as well as between two individuals, is fully protected by the Constitution, p. 560.

Cited and principle followed in dissenting opinion, Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 750, 27 L. 462, 2 S. Ct. 160, majority holding Supreme Court cannot restrain the agents of a State from destroying the obligation of her contract with a citizen, because such relief will require them to disobey the supreme political power of the State; dissenting opinion, Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 803, 27 L. 481, 2 S. Ct. 119, majority holding subsequent act furnishes a remedy equivalent to that existing at date coupons were issued, and the contract is not impaired; Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 286, 29 L. 191, 5 S. Ct. 912, holding unconstitutional any act of the State forbidding the receipt of these coupons as taxes, since by the terms of the act under which they were issued a contract arose; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co., 115 U. S. 673, 29 L.

524, 6 S. Ct. 264, holding grant of exclusive right to supply gas to municipality, upon certain conditions, is a contract; dissenting opinion, In re Ayers, 123 U. S. 515, 31 L. 233, 8 S. Ct. 188, majority holding one selling Virginia coupons agreeing that State shall receive them as taxes, if State refuses, cannot sue her; Sala v. New Orleans, 2 Woods, 194, F. C. 12,246, holding charter of bank a contract and that it could not be impaired by subsequent legislation; Selma v. Mullen, 46 Ala. 414, holding that corporation, unless forbidden, may make a parol contract; State v. County Court, 19 Ark. 367, holding exemption of swamp lands from taxation, was a contract; McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 30, holding act requiring that demands against State must receive sanction of a board is void as to existing claims. Cited, without particular application of the rule, in Camblos v. Railroad Co., 4 Fed. Cas. 1106; Platte, etc., Co. v. Dowell, 17 Colo. 386, 30 Pac. 72, and Scobey v. Gibson, 17 Ind. 577.

Taxing power is of such paramount importance that its abandonment ought not to be presumed, in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon does not plainly appear; accordingly, where corporate charter is silent on subject, no exemption from taxation will be implied, pp. 561, 564.

The citing cases show that this salutary rule has been very uniformly indorsed and followed by the authorities: Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 546, 549, 566, 9 L. 824, 825, 831, holding in grants by the public nothing passes by implication; West River B. Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 542, 12 L. 549, holding that bridge held by corporation can be condemned for a public road; dissenting opinions, Passenger Cases, 7 How. 482, 504, 534, 12 L. 785, 795, 807, majority holding unconstitutional State statutes imposing taxes upon alien passengers arriving in the port of those States; Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. 81, 12 L. 996, and Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 446, 17 L. 178, holding State law imposing a tax upon all money or exchange brokers, is not void for repugnance to power of Congress to regulate commerce; Ohio L. Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 429, 430, 435, 14 L. 1002, 1003, 1005, holding the legislation of Ohio, respecting the taxation of plaintiffs, not to amount to a contract; Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 606, 18 L. 902, holding franchise of a corporation may be taxed; Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 249, 21 L. 327, holding legislature could not repeal law exempting road from taxation; The Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 226, 21 L. 894, holding the intent to confer the exemption must be clear beyond a reasonable doubt; North Mo. R. R. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. 61, 22 L. 294, holding the act did not show an intention of the State to give up its power to tax the property of the railroad; Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 375, 22 L. 816; West Wis. R. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 93 U. S. 598, 23 L. 815; Newton v. Commissioners, 100 U. S. 561, 25 L. 712; Memphis Gas Co. v. Shelby Co., 109 U. H. 350, holding State Constitution does not exempt church property from taxation; State v. Berry, 17 N. J. L. 81, holding an exemption applied to all the property of the company; Cook v. State R. R., 33 N. J. L. 478, holding land not used by the company, but rented, was not exempt; dissenting opinion, Chenango B. Co. v. Binghamton B. Co., 27 N. Y. 113, majority holding the prohibition in charter against the construction of another bridge was not a contract; People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 35 N. Y. 446, 447, holding shares of national bank taxable; People v. Roper, 35 N. Y. 633, 634, holding statute exempting from taxation, not founded upon adequate consideration, may be repealed at any time.

In other jurisdictions are the following, indorsing and applying the rule: Gardner v. Hall, Phill. (N. C.) 24, holding valid a tax upon "dead heads;" State v. Petway, 2 Jones Eq. 405, holding constitutional a tax on holders of bank stock; Attorney-General v. Bank, 4 Jones Eq. 290, holding unconstitutional a tax upon franchise of bank; Simonton v. Lanier, 71 N. C. 505, holding provision in charter that bank "may lend money at such rates as may be agreed upon," does not authorize the taking of more than legal rate; Railroad Co. v. Alsbrook, 110 N. C. 149, 150, 14 S. E. 654, holding that consolidation of railroad not exempt from taxation with one which is, does not exempt property of former; Toledo Bank v. Bond, 1 Ohio St. 667, 701, holding power of legislature to amend and repeal existing laws cannot be surrendered or abridged; Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 368, 438, holding there was a contract to exempt lands, and they could not be taxed; Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbor, 7 Ohio St. 506, holding "act to tax bank, etc.," is constitutional; Bank v. Commonwealth, 10 Pa. St. 450, holding bank, chartered under act prescribing payment of a certain tax on dividends declared, is subject to an increase of taxation; Mott v. Pennsylvania R. R., 30 Pa. St. 31, 72 Am. Dec. 676, holding contract for exemption from taxes unconstitutional; Iron City Bank v. Pittsburgh, 37 Pa. St. 346, holding, under reservation in Constitution of power to revoke charter, legislature may tax corporation for other than State purposes, though charter prohibits it; Brown University v. Granger, 19 R. I. 709, 36 Atl. 722, 36 L. R. A. 849, holding part of endowment rented for business use, was included in "college estate," and not taxable; Rose v. Charleston, 3 S. C. 379, holding that exemption in act was not a contract, but a mere legislative restriction on taxing power of the State, and subject to repeal; Jenkins v. Charleston, 5 S. C. 395, 398, 22 Am. Rep. 17, 20, holding city council may lawfully tax its own stock and that of non-residents; Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. 495, holding the exemption did not include any property, not necessarily included in the privileges; Lawyers' Tax Cases, 8 Heisk. 634, 642, holding invalid tax on privilege of practicing law; Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. State, 8 Heisk. 794, holding railroads not included in act excepting any bank or other joint-stock company from taxation, and laying the tax on the stockholders; Memphis v. Farrington, 8 Baxt. 554, holding charter exemption from taxation of capital stock did not exempt shares of stock; Knoxville & O. R. R. Co. v. Hicks, 9 Baxt. 445, holding immunity from taxation passed to purchasers of railroad; Ex parte Williams, 31 Tex. Cr. 274, 20 S. W. 582, 21 L. R. A. 787, holding act forcing attorney to obtain another license is valid; Thorpe v. Rutland & Bennington R. R. Co., 27 Vt. 145, 146, 62 Am. Dec. 628, 630, holding valid an act requiring cattle-guards at farm-crossings; Morgan v. Cree, 46 Vt. 790, 14 Am. Richmond*, 26 Gratt. 95, holding, if no contract is violated, municipality can prohibit railroad from propelling cars through streets with steam; Roanoke Gas Co. v. Roanoke, 88 Va. 824, 14 S. E. 670, where city gave privilege to lay pipes, for value received, it may afterwards lower grade and have pipes exposed removed; Puget Sound Agr. Co. v. Pierce County, 1 Wash. Ter. 169, 170, holding taxing power will never be presumed to have been relinquished; Janesville Bridge Co. v. Stoughton, 1 Pinn. 672, holding act did not grant an exclusive right to maintain bridge across river at that place; Pingree v. Michigan Central R. R. Co. (Mich.), 76 N. W. 640, holding act conferred on corporation the right to fix tolls within the limit of three cents per mile; Dow v. Northern R. R., 67 N. H. 48, 36 Atl. 534, where a corporation was chartered to operate a railroad, a lease of the road was a change of its corporate purpose, invalid without consent of all stockholders. Cited without particular application in Pearsall v. Great Northern Ry., 161 U. S. 664, 40 L. 844, 16 S. Ct. 709, reviewing the Dartmouth college doctrine at length; Commissioners v. Water P. Co., 104 Mass. 458, 6 Am. Rep. 258; dissenting opinion, Commercial Bank of Rodney v. State, 4 Smedes & M. 508; opinion of court, 58 N. H. 623; Burton v. State, 3 Gill, 7, 8, 10; Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. St. 93; State v. S. P. R. R. Co., 24 Tex. 127; and Kerr v. Woolley, 3 Utah, 465, 24 Pac. 834. See note, 5 Am. St. Rep. 805, on non-performance of condition in grant of franchise, collecting authorities.

Distinguished in Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 331, 12 L. 460, where bank was chartered to discount bills and notes, a law forbidding banks to transfer notes by indorsement, is invalid as applied to notes then in such bank's hands.

Corporations.—The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collected and changing body of men, p. 562.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this proposition: Louisville R. R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. 558, 11 L. 378, and Kansas Pac. R. v. Atchison, etc., R. R., 112 U. S. 415, 28 L. 795, 5 S. Ct. 209, holding that a corporation created by and doing business in a State, is a citizen of that State for the purposes of suing and being sued; Pembina Min. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 189, 31 L. 653, 8 S. Ct. 741, and Santa Clara R. R. Tax Case, 9 Sawy. 192, 18 Fed. 402, holding "person" in fourteenth amendment includes a private corporation; Georgia Banking Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 179, 32 L. 380, 9 S. Ct. 48, holding the granting of special privileges to a corporation, gives legislature power to prevent unreasonable charges and unjust discrimination; Andrews Bros. Co. v. Youngstown Coke Co., 86 Fed. 590, and Cutshaw v. Fargo, 8 Ind. App. 694, 34 N. E. 377, holding that the essential attribute of a corporation is the capacity to act as a legal entity distinct from its members; Mayor, etc. v. Steamboat Co., Charl. (Ga.) 347, holding that a political corporation is liable to the control of the legislature; Rodemacher v. Railway Co., 41 Iowa, 301, 20 Am. Rep. 595, holding act rendering railroads liable for all damages by fire caused by the operation of their road is not unconstitutional; Coffin v. Rich, 45 Me. 509, 71 Am. Dec. 561, and State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 214, holding that corporations like natural persons are amenable to general laws; dissenting opinion, Attorney-General v. Old Colony R. R., 160 Mass. 97, 35 N. E. 260, 22 L. R. A. 122, majority holding unconstitutional a statute compelling one railroad to carry passengers on the credit of another; Bullard v. North. Pac. R. R., 10 Mont. 181, 25 Pac. 123, 11 L. R. A. 251, and n., holding act constitutional prohibiting unjust discrimination by common carriers; Clarke v. Omaha, etc., R. R., 5 Neb. 321, holding corporations enter into contracts by vote of the company, not by unauthorized promises of its members; Assurance Assn. ads. Cole, 26 N. J. L. 365, holding in suit where corporation is a party, the officers and members are not parties and may testify; Charleston I. & T. Co. v. Sebring, 5 Rich. Eq. 346, holding in bill by stockholder against corporate officers to compel a retransfer to bank of shares which they had sold and purchased themselves, the corporation should be made a party; Crafford v. Supervisors, 87 Va. 116, 12 S. E. 149, 10 L. R. A. 132, and n., holding "persons" in act includes corporation. Cited without particular application in Gifford v. Livingston, 2 Den. 395, and Gray v. Navigation Co., 2 Watts & S. 160, 37 Am. Dec. 502.

Taxation.— Power of taxation operates on all persons and property belonging to the body politic, it is a part of all governmental sovereignty, p. 563.

Cited and principle followed in St. Louis v. The Ferry Co., 11 Wall. 429, 20 L. 194, holding ferry-boats of corporation of another State carrying passengers to and from a city, are not taxable under law taxing boats "within the city;" Transportation Co. v. Wheeling, 99 U. S. 281, 25 L. 414; Battle v. Mobile, 9 Ala. 236, 44 Am. Dec. 439, and Howell v. State, 3 Gill, 24, 28, holding steamboats may be taxed by city where owner has its principal office, although they are enrolled as coasting vessels under the laws of the United States; Day v. Buffinton, 3 Cliff. 387, F. C. 3,675, holding salary of judge, payable out of State treasury, not taxable by the United States; Stein v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 613, 618, and Osborne v. Mobile, 44 Ala. 499, holding power to levy tax for local purposes may be delegated by the legislature to a municipal corporation; People v. Naglee, 1 Cal. 236, 52 Am. Dec. 316, holding State may tax foreigners for privilege of working mines; Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 111, 112, holding State may tax a franchise; State v. Fullerton, 7 Rob. (La.) 218, upholding statute imposing tax on passengers on steamboat as constitutional; Stetson v. Bangor, 56 Me. 283, upholding State tax assessed upon shares of national bank situated there; O'Neal v. Bridge Co., 18 Md. 23, 79 Am. Dec. 670, holding equity would not interfere to relieve corporation from payment of taxes assessed in wrong name; Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co. v. Commissioners Clinton Co., 1 Ohio St. 101, holding valid a law authorizing county to subscribe to stock of railroad; Scovill v. Cleveland, 1 Ohio St. 137, holding valid an assessment upon adjoining lands for improvement of street, although it exceeded the actual expense; Champaign Co. Bank v. Smith, 7 Ohio St. 56, holding State bonds, not expressly exempt, are subject to taxation; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 533, holding valid a tax on foreign telegraph company; King v. Portland, 2 Or. 153, holding legislative provision for assessment is not reviewable in the courts; Salt Lake C. N. Bank v. Golding, 2 Utah, 8, holding that a territory can tax the individual shares of stockholders in national banks; Commonwealth v. Moore, 25 Gratt. 954, holding constitutional an act imposing license tax on merchants; Whiting v. West Point, 88 Va. 907, 29 Am. St. Rep. 751, 14 S. E. 699, 15 L. R. A. 862, and n., holding a municipality authorized to tax all property can exempt none; Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 3 W. Va. 332, holding phrase "general taxation" means the company was liable to taxes for State and local purposes. Cited, without any particular application of the doctrine, in Bank of United States v. State, 12 Smedes & M. 458, and Piscataqua v. N. H. B., 7 N. H. 68.

Constitutional law.— Except where the Constitution restricts, the only security against unwise legislation by a State, is the wisdom and justice of the representative body, p. 563.

The citing cases show how extensively and how variously this proposition has been relied upon by the courts; dissenting opinion, Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 669, 22 L. 463, majority holding power of taxation can only be used in aid of a public object; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 497, 25 L. 562, and In re Meador, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 334, F. C. 9,375, holding United States Supreme Court can afford no relief against enforcement of State taxation laws which do not violate the Constitution; Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 355, 31 L. 767, 8 S. Ct. 926, holding act of legislature directing expenses of grading street to be assessed upon adjoining owners, and providing for hearings to fix proportionment of taxes, is not a taking of property without due process of law; United States v. California, etc., Land Co., 148 U. S. 44, 37 L. 360, 13 S. Ct. 463, holding determination of officer of United States within his authority is conclusive in the absence of fraud; Atkinson v. Philadelphia, etc., Co., 2 Fed. Cas. 110, refusing injunction where legislature granted charter to build bridge across navigable waters, which masts of ships would strike; Ryder v. Innerarity, 4 Stew. & P. 30, holding that certificate of confirmation by register is competent evidence in trespass to try title; Borden v. State, 11 Ark. 548, 54 Am. Dec. 238, holding record of allowance and order of payment by Probate Court properly admissible, in action against sheriff refusing to execute fi. fa. upon such order; Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co., 28 Cal. 354, holding legislature can impose tax on adjoining property to improve street; Houghton v. Austin, 47 Cal. 654, holding power to fix rate of taxation is legislative and cannot be delegated to a board; Cheney v. Jones, 14 Fla. 610, holding act authorizing the issuing of bonds to meet an indebtedness not then existing is unconstitutional; Doe v. Deavors, 8 Ga. 482, holding taxes due State are a general lien upon all the property of the debtor; Linton v. Mayor, etc., 53 Ga. 591, holding courts cannot interfere with tax, however unfair, unless it is unconstitutional; Rhinehart v. Schuyler, 2 Gilm. 506, holding State revenue laws valid; Porter v. Railroad Co., 76 Ill. 573, holding State can tax franchise of a corporation; dissenting opinion, Treadway v. Schnauber, 1 Dak. Ter. 266, 46 N. ABANDONMENT UNDER A POLICY OF INSURANCE—1.

The right to compensation from Spain, under the Florida treaty, held under an abandonment made to the underwriters upon vessels and cargoes illegally captured; passed by the assignment under the bankrupt laws, and vested in the assignees.

Comegys et al. v. Vasse, (219) 119

ABANDONMENT—4.

See Insurance.

ACCEPTANCE OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE—4.

1. Courts have latterly leaned very much against extending the doctrine of implied acceptances, so as to sustain an action upon a bill. For all practical purposes in commercial transactions in bills of exchange, such collateral acceptances are extremely inconvenient, and injurious to the credit of bills; and this has led judges frequently to express their dissatisfaction that the rule has been carried so far as it has; and their regret that any other act, than a written acceptance on the bill, had ever been deemed an acceptance.

Boyce and Henry v. Edwards, (122) 803

2. As it respects the rights and the remedy of the immediate parties to the promise to accept, and all others who may take bills upon the credit of such promise, they are equally secure and equally attainable, by an action for the breach of the promise to accept, as they would be by an action on the bill itself.

(123) 803

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS—1.

ACTIONS—1.

When an action is in its origin instituted in the name of A, for the use of B, the cestui que use is, by the law of Maryland, regarded as the real party to the suit.

Gaither v. Bank, (42) 45

ACTIONS—2.

By the law of Mississippi, the assignee of a chose in action may institute a suit in his own name. When, therefore, an executor, having proved the will of his testator, in Kentucky, had assigned a promissory note due to the estate by a citizen of Mississippi, the suit was well brought by the assignee, without any probate of the will in that State.

Harper v. Butler, (239) 410

ACTIONS—3.

In England any instrument or claim, though not negotiable, may be assigned to the king, who can sue upon it in his own name. No valid objection is perceived against giving the same effect to an assignment to the government of this country.

ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES—1.

See Army of the United States, 1, 5.

ADMINISTRATOR—1.

After the recovery of a judgment by an administrator, it is not necessary in a suit upon the judgment that he shall sue as administrator, the debt on the judgment being due to him personally; and if in such suit he shall name himself as administrator, it will be surplusage.

Biddle, adm., v. Wilkins, (686) 315

ADMINISTRATORS—2.

1. Where administrators, acting under the provisions of an Act of Assembly of the State of Ohio, were ordered by the court, vested by the law with the power to grant such order, to sell real estate, and before the sale was made the law was repealed, the powers of the administrators to sell terminated with the repeal of the law.

The Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley's Heirs, (523) 507

2. The lands of an intestate descend not to the administrator, but to the heir; they vest in him, liable to the debts of his ancestor, and subject to be sold for those debts. The administrator has no estate in the land, but a power to sell under the authority of the Court of Common Pleas. This is not an independent power, to be exercised at discretion, when the exigency in his opinion may require it; but it is conferred by the court, in a state of things prescribed by the law. The order of the court is a prerequisite, indispensable to the very existence of the power; and if the law which authorizes the court to make the order, be repealed, the power to sell can never come into existence. The repeal of such a law divests no vested estate, but it is the exercise of a legislative power, which every Legislature possesses. The mode of subjecting the property of a debtor to the demands of a creditor, must always depend on the wisdom of the Legislature.

Id. (1b.) 507

ADMIRALTY—3.

In admiralty cases a decree is not final while an appeal from the same is depending in this court, and any statute which governs the case must be an existing valid statute at the time of affirming of the decree below.

The United States v. Preston, (65) 604

AFFIDAVIT—1.

See Evidence, 20, 21.

AGENT—1.

It is believed to be a general rule, that an agent, with limited powers, cannot bind his principal when he transcends his power. It would seem to follow, that a person transacting business with him, on the credit of his principal, is bound to know the extent of his authority; yet, if the principal has, by his declarations or conduct, authorized the opinion that he had given more extensive powers to his agent than were in fact given, he would not be permitted to avail himself of the imposition, and to protest bills, the drawing of which his conduct had sanctioned.

Schimmelpennich et al. v. Bayard et al., (290) 149

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—4.

1. No principle is better settled than that the powers of an agent cease on the death of his principal.

Galt et al. v. Galloway et al., (344) 880

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—3.

1. C. & Co., merchants of Boston, owners of a ship proceeding on freight from Havana to the consignment of B. & Co. at Leghorn, and to return to Havana, instructed B. & Co. to invest the freight, estimated at four thousand six hundred pesos; two thousand two hundred in marble tiles, and the residue, after paying disbursements, in wrapping paper. B. & Co. undertook to execute these orders. Instead, however, of investing two thousand two hundred pesos in marble, they invested all the funds which came into their hands in wrapping paper, which was received by the captain of the ship and was carried to Havana, and there sold on account of C. & Co. and produced a loss, instead of the profit which would have resulted had the investment been made in marble tiles. As soon as information of the breach of orders was received, C. & Co. addressed a letter to B. & Co., expressing in strong terms their disapprobation of the departure from their orders, but did not signify their determination to disavow the transaction entirely, and consider the paper as sold on account of B. & Co. Held, that C. & Co. were entitled to recover damages for the breach of their orders; that their not having given notice to B. & Co. that the paper would be considered as sold on their account did not injure their claim, and that the amount of the damages may be determined by the positive and direct loss arising plainly and immediately from the breach of the orders.

Bell et al. v. Cunningham, (69) 606

2. If the principal, after a knowledge that his orders have been violated by his agent, receives merchandise purchased for him contrary to orders, and sells the same without signifying any intention of disavowing the acts of the agent, an inference in favor of the ratification of the acts of the agent may fairly be drawn by the jury. But if the merchandise was received by the principal, under a just confidence that his orders to his agent had been faithfully executed, such an inference would be in a high degree unreasonable.

Id., (81) 611

3. The faithful execution of orders which an agent or correspondent has contracted to execute, is of vital importance in commercial transactions, and may often affect the injured party far beyond the actual sum misapplied. A failure in this respect may entirely break up a voyage and defeat the whole enterprise. Speculative damages dependent on possible, successive schemes, ought not to be given in such cases; but positive and direct loss, resulting plainly and immediately from the breach of orders, may be taken into the estimate.

Id., (85) 612

4. The jury, in an action for damages for breach of orders, may compensate the plaintiff for actual loss, and not give vindictive damages. The profits which would have been obtained on the sale of the article directed to be purchased, may be properly allowed as damages.

Id., (86) 612

5. The general rule is, that the principal is bound by the act of his agent no further than he authorizes that agent to bind him; but the extent of the power given to an agent is decided as well from facts as from express delegation. In the estimate or application of such facts, the law has regard to public security, and often applies the rule "that he who trusts must pay." So, also, collusion with an agent to get a debt paid through the intervention of one in failing circumstances, has been held to make the principal liable on the ground of immoral dealing.

AGREEMENT—1.

1. Equity, 3, 4, 5.

2. When property conveyed in trust, to be sold at public auction, had been sold by private contract, and the property was afterwards offered for sale in the manner prescribed by the deed of trust, for the purpose of making a title to the private purchaser; at which time more was bid for the same than the amount for which it had been privately contracted to be sold; the purchaser, by private contract, to whom possession was delivered, at the price agreed on, cannot allege that the sale was void; since, whatever may be the liability of the cestui que trust to those interested in the proceeds of the sale, for the amount offered at the auction, it is not an objection, on the part of the purchaser, to release him from his contract.

ALLEGIANCE—3.

1. What are the rights of the individuals composing a society, and living under the protection of the government when a revolution occurs, a dismemberment takes place, and when new governments are formed, and new relations between the government and the people are established. A person born in New York before the 4th of July, 1776, and who remained an infant with his father in the city of New York during the period it was occupied by the British troops; his father, being a royalist and having adhered to the British government, and left New York with the British troops, taking his son with him, who never returned to the United States, but afterwards became a bishop of the Episcopal Church in Nova Scotia; such a person was born a British subject, and continued an alien, and is disabled from taking land by inheritance in the State of New York.

Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor, (126) 627

2. If such a person had been born after the 4th of July, 1776, and before the 15th of September, 1776, when the British troops took possession of the city of New York and the adjacent places, his infancy incapacitated him from making an election for himself, and his election and character followed that of his father, subject to the right of disaffirmance in a reasonable time after the termination of his minority; which never having been done, he remained a British subject, and disabled from inheriting land in the State of New York.

Id., (1b.) 627

3. The rule as to the point of time at which the American antenati ceased to be British subjects differs in this country and in England, as established by the courts of justice in the respective countries. The English rule is to take the date of the Treaty of Peace in 1783. Our rule is to take the date of the Declaration of Independence.

Id., (121) 625

4. The settled doctrine in this country is, that a person born here, but who left the country before the Declaration of Independence and never returned here, became an alien and incapable of taking lands subsequently by descent. The right to inherit depends upon the existing state of allegiance at the time of the descent cast.

Id., (1b.) 625

5. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance is not applied by the British courts to the American antenati; and this court, in the case of Blight's Lessee v. Rochester (7 Wheat., 544), adopted the same rule with respect to the rights of British subjects here. That, although born before the Revolution, they are equally incapable with those born subsequent to that event of inheriting or transmitting the inheritance of lands in this country.

Id., (1b.) 625

6. The British doctrine, therefore, is that the American antenati, by remaining in America after the peace, lost their character of British subjects; and our doctrine is, that by withdrawing from this country and adhering to the British government they lost, or perhaps, more properly speaking, never acquired, the character of American citizens.

Id., (122) 625

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

7. The right of election must necessarily exist in all revolutions like ours, and is well established by adjudged cases.

Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor. (1b.) 625

8. This court in the case of M'Ilvaine's Lessee v. Coxe (4 Cranch, 211), fully recognized the right of election; but they considered that Mr. Coxe had lost that right by remaining in the State of New Jersey, not only after she had declared herself a sovereign State, but after she had passed laws by which she declared him to be a member of, and in allegiance to, the new government.

Id. (124) 626

9. Allegiance may be dissolved by the mutual consent of the government and its citizens or subjects. The government may release the governed from their allegiance. This is even the British doctrine.

Id. (125) 626

10. Thomas Scott, a native of South Carolina, died in 1782, intestate, seized of land on James Island, having two daughters, Ann and Sarah, both born in South Carolina before the Declaration of Independence. Sarah married D. P., a citizen of South Carolina, and died in 1802, entitled to one-half of the estate. The British took possession of James Island and Charleston in February and May, 1789; and in 1781 Ann Scott married Joseph Shanks, a British officer, and at the evacuation of Charleston in 1782, she went to England with her husband, where she remained until her death in 1801. She left five children born in England. They claimed the other moiety of the real estate of Thomas Scott, in right of their mother, under the ninth article of the Treaty of Peace between this country and Great Britain of the 19th of November, 1794. Held, that they were entitled to recover and hold the same.

Shanks et al. v. Dupont et al. (242) 666

11. If Ann Scott was of age before December, 1782, she remained in South Carolina until that time, her birth and residence must be deemed to constitute her by election a citizen of South Carolina while she remained in that State. If she was not of age, then, under the circumstances of this case, she might well be deemed to hold the citizenship of her father; for children born in a country, continuing while under age in the family of the father, partake of his natural character as a citizen of that country.

Id. (245) 667

12. All British-born subjects whose allegiance Great Britain has never renounced, ought, upon general principles of interpretation, to be held within the intent, as they certainly are within the words of the Treaty of 1794.

Id. (250) 669

13. The capture and possession of James Island in February, 1780, and of Charleston on the 11th of May in the same year, by the British troops, was not an absolute change of the allegiance of the captured inhabitants. They owed allegiance to the conquerors during their occupation; but it was a temporary allegiance, which did not destroy, but only suspended their former allegiance.

Id. (246) 668

14. The marriage of Ann Scott with Shanks, a British officer, did not change or destroy her allegiance to the State of South Carolina, because marriage with an alien, whether friend or enemy, produces no dissolution of the native allegiance of the wife.

Id. (1b.) 668

15. The general doctrine is, that no persons can, by any act of their own, without the consent of the government, put off their allegiance and become aliens.

Id. (1b.) 668

16. The subsequent removal of Ann Shanks to England with her husband, operates as a virtual dissolution of her allegiance, and fixed her future allegiance to the British crown by the Treaty of Peace in 1793.

Id. (1b.) 668

17. The Treaty of 1793 acted upon the state of things as it existed at that period. It took the actual state of things as its basis. All those, whether natives or otherwise, who then adhered to the American States, were virtually absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; all those who then adhered to the British crown were deemed and held subjects of that crown. The Treaty of Peace was a treaty operating between States and the inhabitants thereof.

AMENDMENT—2.

1. The declaration purported to count upon sixty-eight bills of the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and it appeared that one of the bills had been omitted to be described, so that the declaration made out a less sum than the writ claimed or the judgment gave. The defendants in error, plaintiffs below, moved for leave to cure the defect by entering a remittitur of the amount of the bill so omitted and damages pro tanto.

This court thinks itself authorized to make a precedent in furtherance of justice, whereby a more convenient practice may be introduced, and to allow the party to enter his remittitur; but on payment of the costs of the writ, it error is prosecuted no further after such amendment made.

Bank of Kentucky v. Ashley et al., (329) 441

AMENDMENT—3.

This court has repeatedly decided that the exercise of the discretion of the court below, in refusing or granting amendments of pleadings or motions for new trials, affords no grounds for a writ of error. In overruling a motion for leave to withdraw a replication and file a new one, the court exercised its discretion; and the reason assigned, as influencing that discretion, cannot affect the decision.

United States v. Buford. (31) 591

AMERICAN REVOLUTION—3.

For the effect of the American Revolution on the rights of persons born in the British colonies in America before the Revolution, and born in the United States during the Revolution and before the Treaty of Peace, see the cases of Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor, 99, and Shanks v. Dupont, 242.

APPEAL—3.

1. In admiralty cases a decree is not final while an appeal from the same is depending in this court, and any statute which governs the case must be an existing valid statute at the time of affirming the decree below.

The United States v. Preston. (65) 604

2. The Josefa Segunda, having persons of color on board of her, was, on the 11th of February, 1818, found hovering on the coast of the United States, and was seized and brought into New Orleans, and the vessel and the persons on board were libeled in the District Court of the United States of Louisiana, under the Act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1807. After the decree of condemnation below, but pending the appeal to this court, the sheriff of New Orleans went on, with the consent of all the parties to the proceedings, to sell the persons of color as slaves, and sixty-five thousand dollars, the proceeds, were deposited in the registry of the court to await the final disposal of the law. By the tenth section of the Act of the 30th of April, 1818, the six first sections of the act are repealed, and no provision is made by which the condition of the persons of color found on board a vessel hovering on the coast of the United States is altered from that in which they were placed under the Act of 1807, no power having been given to dispose of them otherwise than to appoint some one to receive them. The seventh section of the Act of 1818 confirms no other sales previously or subsequently made under the State laws, but those for illegal importation, and does not comprise the case of a condemnation under the seventh section. The final condemnation of the persons on board the Josefa Segunda took place in this court on the 13th of March, 1820, after Congress had passed the Act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled, "An Act in addition to an act prohibiting the slave trade," by the provisions of which persons of color brought in under any of the acts prohibiting traffic in slaves, were to be delivered to the President of the United States to be sent to Africa. The condemnation could not affect them.

Id. (1b.) 604

3. Where an appeal has been dismissed, the appellant having omitted to file a transcript of the record within the time required by the rule of court, an official certificate of the dismissal of the appeal may not be given by the clerk during the term. The appellant may file the transcript with the clerk during the term, and move to have the appeal reinstated. To allow such a certificate would be to prejudge such a motion.

Bank of the United States et al. v. Swann,
(68) 605

4. It is of great importance to the due administration of justice, and in furtherance of the manifestation of the Legislature, in giving appellate jurisdiction to this court upon final decrees only, that causes should not come up here in fragments or successive appeals. It would occasion very great delays and oppressive expenses.

Canter v. The American and Ocean Insurance Company,

ARBITRAMENT—1.

See Award.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES—1.

1. The adjutant and inspector-general of the Army of the United States was not entitled to double rations, from the 30th September, 1818, to the 31st May, 1821.

Parker v. The United States, (296) 151

2. The President of the United States has a discretionary power to allow such additional number of rations, to officers commanding at separate posts, as he may think just, having respect to the special circumstances of each post. The law granting this authority is not imperative; and in the exercise of his discretion, the President may allow, or refuse to allow, additional rations, as in his opinion he may deem proper.

Id. (296) 151

3. The Secretary of War, as the legitimate organ of the President, under a general authority from him, may exercise the power; and make the allowance to officers having a separate command.

Id. (297) 152

4. No officer is entitled to the additional allowance, unless he be a commandant at a separate post, and then the claim must be sanctioned by the executive. The allowance cannot be made to more than one officer at the same station.

Id. (Ib.) 152

5. In the discharge of his ordinary duties, the adjutant and inspector-general has no distinct command; his duties consist in details of service, and not in active military command.

Id. (Ib.) 152

6. An officer may be said to command at a separate post, when he is out of the reach of the orders of the commander-in-chief, or of a superior officer in command in the neighborhood. He must then issue the necessary orders to the troops under his command, it being impossible to receive them from a superior officer.

Id. (Ib.) 152

7. The general order of the War Department, of 16th March, 1816, directing double rations to be allowed to officers commanding military departments, is construed to relate to the geographical sections of country, into which the two divisions of the army are divided, and which were denominated "departments," and intended to designate the extent of actual command given to the officer commanding each department; it does not relate to the law of the 3d of March, 1813, "for the better organization of the general staff of the Army."

Id. (Ib.) 152

ASSIGNMENT—1.

1. In general, it may be affirmed that mere personal torts which die with the party, and do not survive to his personal representatives, are incapable of passing by assignment; and that vested rights, ad rem and in re, possibilities coupled with an interest and claim, growing out of and adhering to property, may pass by assignment.

Comegys et al. v. Vasse, (213) 117

2. The law gives to the act of abandonment, to underwriters, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish. The underwriter then stands in the place of the insured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be recovered from destruction.

Id. (214) 117

3. It is clear that the right to compensation for damages and injuries to which citizens of the United States were entitled, and which, under the treaty with Spain, were to be the subjects of compensation; passed by abandonment to the underwriters upon property, which had been seized or captured.

Id. (215) 118

4. The right to indemnity for an unjust capture, on the sovereign, whether remediable in his own courts, or by his own extraordinary interposition, or grants upon private petition, or upon public negotiation, is a right attached to the ownership of the property itself, and passes by cession to the account of the ultimate sufferer; and is afterwards assignable by the person to whom it had been ceded.

Id. (Ib.) 118

5. It is not universally, though it may be ordinarily, the test of a right, that it may be enforced in a court of justice. Claims and debts due by a sovereign are not commonly capable of being so enforced. It does not follow that because an unjust sentence cannot be reversed, that the party injured has lost all right to justice, or all claim, upon principles of public law, to remuneration.

Id. (216) 118

6. The right to compensation from Spain, held under abandonment made to underwriters, and accepted by them for damages and injuries, and which were to be satisfied under the treaty by the United States, passed to the assignees of the bankrupt, who held such rights by the provisions of the bankrupt law of the United States, passed April 4, 1800.

ASSUMPSIT—2.

1. The Act incorporating the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky contains a provision by which it is enacted, that the bank shall receive money on deposit without being required to give an obligation under seal to repay it. This enactment must be construed with regard to the practice of banking, and the general understanding of mankind; and must create a liability to the depositor by the simple act of depositing, that is, an assumpsit in law, implied from an act in pais.

The Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Wister et al., (324) 439

2. Upon the deposit being made in the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the cashier gave under his hand a certificate that there had been deposited to the credit of the plaintiffs below, $7,730.81, which is subject to their order on presentation of this certificate. The deposit was made in the notes of the bank, and when the same were deposited, and when demand of payment was made, the notes were passing at one-half their nominal value. When the certificate was presented to the bank, the cashier offered to pay the amount in the notes of the bank, but they refused to receive payment in anything but gold or silver. The language of the certificate is expressive of a general, not a specific deposit, and the Act of Incorporation is express, that the bank shall pay and redeem their bills in gold or silver. The transaction then was equivalent to receiving and depositing the gold or silver; if the bank did not so understand it, they might have refused to receive it; and the plaintiffs would certainly have recovered the gold and silver, to the amount upon the face of the bills.

Id. (325) 439

3. The bank having offered to pay the amount of the certificate in their bills, they put their own construction on the same, and they cannot afterwards say that the plaintiffs below should have accompanied the certificate with a check.

ASSUMPSIT—3.

When money of the United States has been received by one public agent from another public agent, whether it was received in an official or private capacity, there can be no doubt but that it was received to the use of the United States; and they may maintain an action of assumpsit against the receiver for the same.

The United States v. Buford, (28) 590

ASSUMPSIT—4.

1. Everything which disaffirms the contract; everything which shows it to be void; may be given in evidence on the general issue, in an action of assumpsit.

ATTACHMENT—1.

1. The defendant in error had sued out an attachment, under the law of Maryland, against Robert Barry, and had filed an account against James D.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Barry, said to have been assumed by Robert Barry, the plaintiff in error. Robert Barry appeared, gave special bail, and discharged the attachment. The plaintiff below then filed a declaration of "indebitatus assumpsit" "for money had and received" and "for goods sold and delivered," to which Robert Barry pleaded the general issue. The parties went to trial, and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant in error.

2. The court attaches no importance to the variance between the account filed when the attachment issued, and the declaration filed after the attachment was dissolved by the entry of bail, and the appearance of the defendant. The defendant having pleaded to the declaration, the cause stood as if the suit had been brought in the usual manner, and no reference can be had to the proceedings on the attachment.

AWARD—1.

1. There is a class of cases upon awards to be found in the books, in which arbitrators have been held to more than ordinary strictness, in pursuing the terms of the submission, and in awarding upon the several distinct matters submitted upon the ground of this submission being conditional, ita quod. But the rule is to be understood with this qualification: that, in order to impeach an award made in pursuance of a conditional submission, on the ground of part only of the matters in controversy having been decided, the party must distinctly show that there were other points in difference, of which express notice was given to the arbitrators, and that they neglected to determine them.

Karthauss v. Ferrer et al.,

(227) 123

2. It is a settled rule in the construction of awards, that no intendment shall be indulged to overturn an award, but every intendment shall be allowed to uphold it.

Id.

(228) 123

3. If a submission be of all actions real and personal, and the award be only of actions personal, the award is good, for it shall be presumed no actions real were depending between the parties.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

The charter of the Bank of the United States forbids the taking of a greater rate of interest than six per centum, but it does not declare a contract on which a greater interest has been taken or reserved, to be void. Such a contract is void upon general principles. Courts of justice are instituted to carry into effect the laws of a country, and they cannot become auxiliary to the violation of those laws. There can be no civil right where there can be no legal remedy; and there can be no legal remedy for that which is itself illegal.

BANKRUPT AND BANKRUPTCY—1.

The right to compensation from Spain, held under abandonment made to underwriters, and accepted by them for damages and injuries, which were to be satisfied under the treaty by the United States, passed to the assignees of the bankrupt, who held such rights by the provisions of the bankrupt law of the United States, passed April 4, 1800.

BARRATRY—3.

2. The British courts have adopted the safe and legal rule, in deciding that where the policy covers the risk of barratry, and fire is the proximate cause of the loss, they will not sustain the defense that negligence was the remote cause, and will hold the assurers liable for the loss.

Id.

(236) 664

3. The rule that a loss, the proximate cause of which is a peril insured against, is a loss within the policy, although the remote cause may be negligence of the master or mariners, has been affirmed in several successive cases in the English courts.

BILLS OF CREDIT—4.

1. In its enlarged, and perhaps literal sense, the term "bill of credit" may comprehend any instrument by which a State engages to pay money at a future day; thus including a certificate given for money borrowed. But the language of the Constitution itself, and the mischief to be prevented, equally limit the interpretation of the terms. The word "emit" is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received, or for money borrowed for present use. Nor are instruments executed for such purposes, in common language, denominated "bills of credit." "To emit bills of credit," conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the community, for its ordinary purposes, as money; which paper is redeemable at a future day. This is the sense in which the terms have always been understood.

Craig et al. v. The State of Missouri,

(431) 910

2. The Constitution considers the emission of bills of credit and the enactment of tender laws as distinct operations, independent of each other; which may be separately performed. Both are forbidden. To sustain the one, because it is not also the other; to say that bills of credit may be emitted, if they be not made a tender in payment of debts, is, in effect, to expunge that distinct independent prohibition, and to read the clause as if it had been entirely omitted. Id.

(434) 911

3. On the 27th day of June, 1821, the Legislature of the State of Missouri passed an Act, entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan offices;" by the third section of which, the officers of the treasury of the State, under the direction of the governor, were required to issue certificates to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, of denominations not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents, in the following form: "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury of any of the loan-offices in the State of Missouri, in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of ——— dollars, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date." These certificates were to be receivable at the treasury, and by tax-gatherers and other public officers, in payment of taxes, or moneys due or to become due to the State, or to any town or county therein, and by all officers, civil and military, in the State, in discharge of salaries and fees of office; and in payment for salt made at the salt springs owned by the State, and to be afterwards leased by the authority of the Legislature. The twenty-third section of the act pledges certain property of the State for the redemption of these certificates; and the law authorizes the governor to negotiate a loan of silver or gold for the same purpose. A provision is made in the law for the gradual withdrawal of the certificates from circulation, and all the certificates have since been redeemed. The commissioners of the loan-offices were authorized to make loans of the certificates to citizens of the State, assigning to each district a proportion of the amount of the certificates, to be secured by mortgage or personal security; the loans to bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and the loans on personal property to be for less than two hundred dollars. Held, that the certificates issued under the authority of the law of Missouri, were "bills of credit;" and that their emission was prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall "emit bills of credit." Id.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—2.

The record contains, embodied in the bill of exceptions, the whole of the testimony and evidence offered at the trial of the cause by each party in support of the issue. It is very voluminous, and as no exception was taken to its competency or sufficiency, either generally or for any particular purpose, it is not properly before this court for consideration, and forms an expensive and unnecessary burthen upon the record. This court has had occasion, in many cases, to express its regret on account of irregular proceedings of this nature. There was not the slightest necessity of putting any portion of the evidence in this case upon the record, since the opinion of the court delivered to the jury presented a general principle of law; and the application of the evidence to it was left to the jury.

Pennock et al. v. Dialogue,

(15) 332

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—4.

1. Practice.

2. On the trial of a cause in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, exceptions were taken to opinions of the court delivered in the course of the trial; and some time after the trial was over, a bill of exceptions was tendered to the district judge, which he refused to sign, objecting to some of the matters stated in the same, and at the same time altering the bill then tendered so as to conform to his recollection of the facts of the case, and inserting in the bill all that he deemed proper to be contained in the same; which bill of exceptions, thus altered, was signed by the judge. On the motion of the party who had tendered the bill of exceptions, a rule was granted on the district judge to show cause why he did not sign the bill of exceptions as first tendered him. To this rule the judge returned his reasons for refusing to sign the bill so tendered, and stating that he had signed such a bill of exceptions as he considered correct.

BY THE COURT: This is not a case in which the judge has refused to sign a bill of exceptions. The judge has signed such a bill as he thinks correct. The object of the rule is to oblige the judge to sign a particular bill of exceptions which has been offered to him. The court granted the rule to show cause, and the judge has shown cause by saying he has done all that can be required from him, and that the bill offered is not such a bill as he can sign. The court cannot order him to sign such a bill.

Ex-parte Martha Bradstreet. (102) 796

3. The law requires that a bill of exceptions should be tendered at the trial.

If a party intends to take a bill of exceptions, he should give notice to the judge at the trial; and if he does not file it at the trial, he should move the judge to assign a reasonable time within which he may file it. A practice to sign it after the term must be understood to be matter of consent between the parties; unless the judge has made an express order in the term, allowing such a period to prepare it.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—1.

1. The deposit of a bill in one bank to be transmitted to another for collection, is a common usage of great public convenience, the effect of which is well understood; and the duty of a bank receiving such a bill for collection, is precisely the same whoever may be the owner thereof, and, if it was unwilling to undertake the collection without precise information on the subject, the duty ought to have been declined.

The Bank of Washington v. Triplett & Neale. (30) 40

2. By failing to demand payment of a bill held for collection, the bank would make the bill its own, and would become liable to its real owner for the amount.

Id. (31) 40

3. The allowance of days of grace for the payment of a bill of exchange, or note, is now universally understood to enter into every bill or note of a mercantile character, and so, to form a part of the contract, that the bill does not become due until the last day of grace.

Id. (31) 40

4. It is the usage of the Bank of Washington, and of other banks in the District of Columbia, to demand payment of a bill on the day after the last day of grace, and this usage has been sanctioned by the decisions of this court. This usage is equally binding on parties who were not acquainted with its existence, but who have resorted to the bank governed by such usage, to make the bill negotiable.

Id. (32) 41

5. The usage of the place on which a bill is drawn, or where payment is demanded, uniformly regulates the number of days of grace which must be allowed.

Id. (34) 42

6. The failure of a bank holding a bill payable after date for collection, to give notice to the drawer that the drawee was not found at home when called upon to accept the bill, is not such negligence as discharges the drawer from his liability.

Id. (35) 42

7. A bill of exchange, payable after date, need not be presented for acceptance before the day of payment; but if presented, and acceptance be refused, it is dishonored, and notice must be given. The absence from his home of the drawee of a bill payable after date, when the holder of a bill, or his agent, call with it for acceptance, is not a refusal to accept; but such absence, when the bill is due, is a refusal to pay, and authorizes a protest.

964

Id. (Ib.) 42

8. In a suit instituted by the holder of a bill against the bank for negligence in relation to demand or notice of nonpayment of the bill, the court, although required, are not bound to declare the law as between the holder and the drawer. The bank was the agent of the holder, and not of the drawer, and might consequently so act as to discharge the drawer without becoming liable to its principal.

Id. (36) 42

9. A stranger to the drawer and indorser of a nonaccepted bill of exchange, may intervene supra protest, to pay the same for the honor of an indorser or drawer.

König v. Bayard et al. (262) 137

10. It is no objection to this intervention that it has been done at the request and under the guarantee of the drawees of the bill, who had refused to accept or pay the same. The arrangements made by the payer of the dishonored bill with the drawee, by which he was to be protected from loss, do not affect the liability of the party to the bill for whose honor it has been paid.

Id. (Ib.) 137

11. If A, at the request of the drawee of a bill of exchange, and under his guarantee, accept and pay the bill supra protest for the honor of the indorser, the party against whom suit is brought for the amount paid, may avail himself of every defense which he could have had if the bill had been paid supra protest for the honor of the indorser by the drawee, and suit brought for the same.

Id. (Ib.) 137

12. The court confirm the principle established in the case of Coolidge v. Payson, (2 Wheat., 75), that a letter, written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding the person who makes the promise.

Schimmelpennich et al. v. Bayard et al. (283) 146

13. If the drawees of a bill of exchange, who refuse to honor the bill, and thus deny the authority of the drawer to draw upon them, were bound in good faith to accept or pay the bill as drawees, they will not be permitted to change the relation in which they stood to the parties on the bill, by a wrongful act. They can acquire no right as the holders of the bill paid supra protest, if they were bound to honor it in the character of drawees.

Id. (285) 147

14. A bill of exchange was drawn against shipments made to the drawee, but no letter of advice was written by the shipper to the consignees of the property and drawees of the bill, ordering the proceeds of the shipment to be applied to the discharge of the bill; but directions were given to charge the bill generally to the account of the shipper; held, that the drawees were not bound to accept or pay the bill in consequence of the proceeds of the shipment being received by them.

Id. (286) 147

15. A merchant has a right, by the usage of trade, to draw on effects placed in the hands of the drawee by shipment, and the consignee must pay the bills if the shipment places funds in his hands.

Id. (288) 148

16. Promissory notes, passim.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—2.

1. Promissory notes.

2. Bills of exchange, payable at a given time after date, need not be presented for acceptance at all; and payment may at once be demanded at their maturity.

Townsend v. Sumrall. (178) 388

3. It is admitted, that in respect to foreign bills of exchange, the notarial certificate of protest is, of itself, sufficient proof of the dishonor of a bill, without any auxiliary evidence.

Id. (179) 389

4. It is not disputed, that by the general custom of merchants in the United States, bills of exchange drawn in one State on another State, are, if dishonored, protested by a notary; and the production of such protest is the customary document of dishonor.

Peters 1. 2, 3, 4.

Id. (180) 389

5. If a person undertake to accept a bill in consideration that another will purchase one already drawn, or to be thereafter drawn, and as an inducement to the purchaser to take it; and the bill is purchased upon the credit of such promise for a sufficient consideration; such promise to accept is binding upon the party. It is an original promise to the purchaser, not merely a promise for the debt of another; and having a sufficient consideration to support it, in reason and justice as well as in law, it ought to bind him.

Id. (181) 389

6. It can make no difference in law, whether the debt for which a bill of exceptions is taken is a pre-existing debt, or money then paid for the bill. In each case there is a substantial credit given by the party to the drawer upon the bill, and the party parts with his present rights at the instance of the promisee, whose promise is substantially a new and independent one, and not a mere guarantee of the existing promise of the drawer. Under such circumstances, there is no substantial distinction, whether the bill be then in existence or be drawn afterwards. In each case, the object of the promise is to induce the party to take the bill upon the credit of the promise.

Id. (182) 339

If the holder of a bill of exchange, at the time of taking the bill, knew that the drawee had not funds in his hands belonging to the drawee, and took the bill on the promise of the drawee to accept it, expecting to receive funds from the drawer, the promise of the drawee to accept the bill, constitutes a valid contract between the parties, notwithstanding the failure of the drawer to place funds in his hands. The acceptance of the drawee of a bill binds him, although it is known to the holder that he has no funds in his hands. It is sufficient that the holder trusts to such acceptance.

Id. (183) 390

8. It is well settled that if a bill of exchange be drawn by one partner in the name of the firm, or if a bill drawn on the firm by their usual name and style, be accepted by one of the partners, all the partnership are bound. It results necessarily from the nature of the association, and the objects for which it is constituted, that each partner should possess the power to bind the whole, when acting in the name by which the partnership is known; although the consent of the other partners to the particular contract should not be obtained, or should be withheld.

Le Roy v. Johnson. (197) 396

9. Where a bill of exchange was drawn by A, after the dissolution of his partnership with B, and the proceeds of the bill went to pay, and did pay, the partnership debts of A & B, which A on the dissolution of the firm had assumed to pay; the holder of the bill after its dishonor can have no claim on B in consequence of the particular appropriation of the proceeds of the bill.

Id. (199) 396

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—3.

1. F. at New Orleans was the correspondent of P. at Boston, received goods from him on consignment, and was from time to time directed to purchase produce, and ship the same to P., and was instructed to draw on P. for the funds to pay for the same. When he made purchases, "the bills of parcels were made out in the name of F., and the accounts assured in the books of the different merchants in his name." The general course of the business was, that P. sent out, in his own vessels, merchandise to F. which was sold by F., and F., at the request of P., purchased from merchants in New Orleans produce, and shipped the same as ordered by P.; and to put himself in funds for the same when necessary, drew bills of exchange on P. who had always, until the presentation of the bills on which this suit was brought, accepted and paid the same; but he did not in his purchases act under the idea that he was restricted in his purchases to the drawing of bills for the payment of the articles purchased for P. F. purchased a quantity of tobacco to be shipped to P.; and payment for the same in bills on P. made a particular part of the contract for the purchase. At the time of the purchase, F. showed to the vendor of the tobacco the letters from P. ordering the purchase and shipment of the same. Some of Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

the bills drawn by F. on P., and which were delivered to the vendor of the tobacco in payment for the same, were refused acceptance and payment, and this suit was instituted for the recovery of the amount of the bills from P. Held, that P. was not liable to pay the bills.

Parsons v. Armor and Oakley. (426) 729

2. A bill of exchange is the substitute for the actual transmission of money by sea or land. Power therefore to draw on a house in good credit, and to throw the bills upon the market, is equivalent to a deposit of cash in the vaults of the agent. There is not the least tittle of evidence in this cause to show that P. meant to use the credit of the drawer of the bills on which this suit is brought, or to authorize him to pledge his credit in anything but the negotiation of the bills. This depended on the confidence which merchants of New Orleans who wished to remit would place in the solvency and integrity of the drawer and drawee, and had no connection whatever with the application of the money thus raised to the purchases ordered by the principal. As to those purchases, the agent was authorized to go no farther than to apply the funds deposited with him.

Id. (428) 730

3. Of the general power to protest the bills of one who has overdrewn, there can be no question; for it is the only security which the one who gives a power to draw bills, and throw them on the market, has against the bad faith of his correspondent. He takes the risk of paying the damages, if in fault, or of throwing them on the other, if he has actually abused his trust. It is a question between him and his correspondent.

Id. (429) 730

4. The currency which a merchant may give to bills drawn on him by a correspondent, by payment of such bills, does not deprive him of the security he has a right to, by refusing his acceptance of other bills so drawn.

Id. (430) 731

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—4.

1. Action on two bills of exchange drawn by Hutchinson, on B. and H. in favor of E. which the drawers, B. and H. refused to accept, and with the amount of which bills E. sought to charge the defendants as acceptors, by virtue of an alleged promise before the bills were drawn.

The rule on this subject is laid down with great precision by this court in the case of Coolidge v. Payson (2 Wheat., 75), after much consideration, and a careful review of the authorities, that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding on the person who makes the promise.

Boyce and Henry v. Edwards. (121) 803

2. Whenever the holder of a bill seeks to charge the drawee as acceptor, upon some occasional or implied undertaking, he must bring himself within the spirit of the rule laid down in Coolidge v. Payson.

Id. (1b.)

3. The rule laid down in Coolidge v. Payson requires the authority to be pointed at the specific bill or bills to which it is intended to be applied, in order that the party who takes the bill upon the credit of such authority may not be mistaken in its application.

Id. (1b.)

4. The distinction between an action on a bill, as an accepted bill, and one founded on a breach of promise to accept, seems not to have been attended to. But the evidence necessary to support the one or the other is materially different. To maintain the former, the promise must be applied to the particular bill alleged in the declaration to have been accepted. In the latter, the evidence may be of a more general character; and the authority to draw may be collected from circumstances, and extended to all bills coming fairly within the scope of promise.

Id. (1b.)

5. Courts have latterly leaned very much against extending the doctrine of implied acceptances so as to sustain an action upon a bill. For all practical purposes in commercial transactions in bills of exchange, such collateral acceptances are extremely inconvenient and injurious to the credit of bills; and this has led judges frequently to express their dissatisfaction that the rule has been carried so far as it has; and their regret that any other act, than a written acceptance on the bill, had ever been deemed an acceptance.

Id.

(Ib.)

6. As it respects the rights and the remedy of the immediate parties to the promise to accept, and all others who may take bills upon the credit of such promise, they are equally secure and equally attainable by an action for the breach of the promise to accept, as they would be by an action on the bill itself.

Id.

(Ib.)

7. The contract to accept the bills, if made at all, was made in Charleston, South Carolina. The bills were drawn in Georgia, on B. and H. in Charleston, and with a view to the State of South Carolina for the execution of the contract. The interest is to be charged at the rate of interest in South Carolina.

Id.

(Ib.)

BILLS OF LADING—1.

1. By the well settled principles of commercial law, the consignee is the authorized agent of the owner, whoever he may be, to receive the goods, and by his indorsement of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of any adverse interest, the latter becomes, as against all the world, the owner of the goods. This is the result of the principle that bills of lading are transferable by indorsement, and thus may pass the property.

Coward v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (445) 214

2. Strictly speaking, no person but the consignee can by any indorsement on the bill of lading pass the legal title to the goods. But if the shipper be the owner and the shipment be on his own account and risk, although he may not pass the title by virtue of a mere indorsement of the bill of lading, unless he be the consignee, or the goods be deliverable to his order; yet, by an assignment on the bill of lading, or by a separate instrument, he can pass the legal title to the same, and it will be good against all persons, except purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, by indorsement on the bill of lading itself. Such an assignment by the owner passes the legal title against his agents or factors, and creditors, in favor of the assignee.

BRITISH TREATY—3.

1. For the effect of the British treaties of 1783 and 1794, on the claims of British subjects born in America before the Treaty of Peace, see the case of Juglis v. The Trustees of The Sailor's Snug Harbor, 99, and Shanks et al. v. Dupont et al., 242.

2. Thomas Scott, a native of South Carolina, died in 1782, intestate, seized of land on James Island, having two daughters, Ann and Sarah, both born in South Carolina before the Declaration of Independence. Sarah married D. P., a citizen of South Carolina, and died in 1802, entitled to one-half of the estate. The British took possession of James Island and Charleston in February and May, 1780; and in 1781 Ann Scott married Joseph Shanks, a British officer, and at the evacuation of Charleston in 1782, she went to England with her husband, where she remained until her death in 1801. She left five children born in England. They claimed the other moiety of the real estate of Thomas Scott, in right of their mother, under the ninth article of the Treaty of Peace between this country and Great Britain of the 19th of November, 1794. Held, that they were entitled to recover and hold the same.

Shanks et al. v. Dupont et al., (242) 666

4. The Treaty of 1783 acted upon the state of things as it existed at that period. It took the actual state of things as its basis. All those, whether natives or otherwise, who then adhered to the American States, were virtually absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; all those who then adhered to the British crown were deemed and held subjects of that crown. The Treaty of Peace was a treaty operating between States and the inhabitants thereof.

CARRIERS—2.

1. The law regulating the responsibility of common carriers, does not apply to the case of carrying intelligent beings, such as negroes. The carrier has not, and cannot have over them the same absolute control that he has over inanimate matter. In the nature of things, and in their character, they resemble passengers, and not packages of goods. It would seem reasonable, therefore, that the responsibility of the carrier should be measured by the law which is applicable to passengers, rather than by that which is applicable to the carriage of common goods.

Boyce v. Anderson,

(155) 380

2. The law applicable to common carriers is one of great rigor. Though to the extent to which it has been carried, and in the cases to which it has been applied, its necessity and its policy are admitted; yet it ought not to be carried further or applied to new cases. It has not been applied to living men, and it ought not to be.

CHANCERY—3.

1. The courts of the United States have equity jurisdiction to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud, after one of the parties to it has been proceeded against on the law side of the court, and a judgment has been obtained against him for a part of the money stipulated to be paid by the contract.

Boyce's Executors v. Grundy,

4. It is not an answer to an application to a court of chancery for relief in rescinding a contract to say that the fraud alleged is partial, and might be the subject of compensation by a jury. The law, which abhors fraud, does not permit it to purchase indulgence, dispensation, or absolution.

CHANCERY AND CHANCERY PRACTICE—1.

1. Where a bill had been filed against a trustee of real estate, and, after his death, administration had been granted to A, who, on the petition of creditors interested in the trust, was also appointed by the court the substituted trustee, and the court went on to decree that A, as trustee, should execute certain conveyances, the decree was held to be invalid, the course of proceeding being rather to make the decree against A in the character of administrator, because he claimed as administrator under a title derived from the original trustee, and was the person designated by law to represent him; or that a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of revivor, should have been filed against the substituted trustee, in which all the proceedings should have been stated, and he required to answer the charges contained in the original and supplemental bill.

Greenleaf v. Queen et al.,

2. A decree of a court of chancery is erroneous which, after ordering certain acts to be done to enable a party to execute certain duties assigned to him, dismisses the bill, as it puts the cause out of court and renders the decree ineffectual, and it is no answer to this objection, that it appears by the record in the case, that the acts ordered to be done have been performed, since the error is in the decree itself, and not in its execution.

Greenleaf v. Queen et al. (148) 89

3. A bill may be dismissed where the plaintiff, when called upon to make proper parties, refuses, or is guilty of unreasonable delay in doing so; but this must be done on demurrer, plea, or answer, pointing out the person or persons whom the defendant insists ought to be made parties.

Id. (149) 90

4. When a debtor had conveyed to a trustee real estate to be sold for the benefit of creditors, and the trustee dying before the conveyance of the property to a purchaser, another trustee was appointed by the court, upon the application of the creditors, to execute the trust; in a proceeding relative to the execution of the trust and the conveyance of the estate, it is necessary that the heirs-at-law, of the first trustee, shall be parties to the same, as the legal title to the estate did not pass to the substituted trustee, by the appointment, but remained in the legal heirs.

Id. (149) 90

5. A court of chancery is not the proper tribunal to enforce a forfeiture, the remedy for the same being at law.

Horsburg v. Baker, (236) 127

6. After an answer and discovery, the rule is, that a suit brought merely for discovery, cannot be revived. The object is obtained, and the plaintiff has no motive for reviving it.

Id. (149) 90

7. A bill had been filed originally for discovery, and afterwards became a bill for relief. The relief prayed for was a forfeiture, which might be enforced at law. Under such circumstances, it was proper to dismiss the bill, so far as it sought for relief against the forfeiture; but the dismissal should have been without prejudice to the legal rights of the parties, as an absolute dismissal might be considered as a decree against the title the plaintiff claimed, and which, by the bill and the evidence obtained under it, he sought to establish.

Id. (149) 90

8. If in a case where the loss of a deed or other instrument is made the ground for coming into a court of equity, for discovery and relief, an affidavit of its loss must be made and annexed to the bill, and the absence of such affidavit is good cause of demurrer to the bill; yet, if the party charged by the bill failed to demur for the cause, but answered over to the bill, or permitted it to be taken for confessed, by default against him, it seems that the absence of the affidavit is not a sufficient cause for the reversal of the decree.

Findlay et al. v. Hinde and Wife, (244) 130

9. Where, in a bill filed for discovery and relief, the party relied upon a deed said to have been lost, but which had never been formally executed to convey the real estate, and upon a receipt of the purchase money, binding the party to convey the estate, the person alleged to have executed the lost deed, and who gave the receipt, should have been made a party to the proceeding, although he had subsequently by a legal and formal conveyance duly executed, conveyed the estate to others and thus, so far as he could, divested himself of all title in the same.

Id. (246) 130

10. The decree of the Circuit Court directed two of the defendants, in whom was the legal title to the lot of ground claimed by the plaintiff in the bill, to convey the same, and awarded costs generally against all the defendants. All the defendants appealed together to this court, some of whom held the legal title to the lot, and all the defendants had an interest in defending this title, standing as they did, in the relation of vendors and warrantees, and vendees. Although the defendants, against whom there is a decree for costs only, could not appeal from this decree for costs, yet, the reversal of the decree of the Circuit Court was made general, as to all of the appellants, and the whole case opened.

Id. (247) 131

11. Although it seems to be a general rule that a court of chancery will not decree a specific performance of contracts, except for the purchase of lands, or things which relate to the realty and are of a permanent nature, and that where contracts are for chattels, and compensation can be made in damages, the parties may be left to their remedy at law; yet, notwithstanding this distinction between Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

personal contracts for goods, and contracts for lands, there are many cases to be found where specific performance of contracts relating to personality have been enforced in chancery, and courts will only weigh with greater nicety contracts of this description than such as relate to lands.

The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v.

Louisa and Maria Seton, (305) 155

12. Although an objection for want of proper parties may be taken at the hearing, yet the objection ought not to prevail upon the final hearing of an appeal, except in very strong cases, and where the court perceives a necessary and indispensable party is wanting.

Id. (306) 155

13. All persons materially interested in the subject of a suit in chancery ought to be made parties, either plaintiffs or defendants; but this is a rule established for the convenient administration of justice, and is more or less within the discretion of the court, and it should be restricted to parties whose interests are in the issue and to be affected by the decree. The relief granted will always be so modified as not to affect the interests of others.

Id. (149) 90

14. It is a well settled rule that a court is not bound to take notice of any interest acquired in the subject matter of the suit, pending the dispute.

Id. (310) 157

15. If a bill charges a defendant with notice of a particular fact, an answer must be given without a special interrogatory to the matter. But a defendant is not bound to answer an interrogatory, not warranted by some matter contained in a former part of the bill.

McDonald v. Smalley et al., (625) 289

CHANCERY AND CHANCERY PRACTICE—2.

1. As the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court claimed under a conveyance made in pursuance of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, the bill ought not to have been dismissed for want of parties. The Circuit Court ought to have given leave to make new parties, and on their failing to bring the proper parties before the court, the dismissal should have been without prejudice.

Hunt v. Wickliffe, (215) 402

2. The court has decided that a suit could be maintained in equity, by the holder of an indorsed note, against a remote indorser; and upon grounds perfectly familiar to courts exercising equity jurisdiction.

The Bank of the United States v.

Weisiger, (331) 441

3. It has been decided in Kentucky, that a suit at law could not be maintained in that State by the indorsee, against a remote indorser. The conclusion then results from our decisions, that he must be let into equity; for an indorsement is certainly no release to the previous indorsers; and the ultimate assignee alone is entitled to the benefit of their liability. And this we understand to be consistent with the received opinions and practice in Kentucky.

Id. (348) 447

4. The testatrix directed that the interest of certain funds should be applied "to the proper education" of certain persons, her nephews, "so that they may be severally fitted and accomplished in some useful trade;" and gave to each of them "who should live to finish his education or reach the age of twenty-one years of age, one hundred pounds to set him up in his trade." She also gave the whole of her estates of every description, to be equally divided among certain persons, who should be living when the interest applicable to the education of her nephews should cease to be required, they being some of the persons among whom the same was to be divided; and she directed that so long as any one of the three nephews should live, had not finished his education, or arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the division of the property so devised and given, should be deferred, and no longer.

A bill was filed by one of the three nephews of the testatrix, charging that the executors had not paid the several sums of money bequeathed to him, and praying that they may be decreed to pay the same. No other persons were made parties to the proceeding but the executors; and after a report of the matter, the cause came on to a hearing, and the Circuit Court dismissed the bill for want of proper parties. The defendants at the argument insisted that not only the two nephews, whose education was provided for by the testatrix, should have been made parties, but also all the residuary legatees. So far as the bill sought to obtain such a portion of the fund as was by a fair construction of the will applicable to the education of the nephews of the testatrix, they alone were required to be parties; and the court reversed the decree of the Circuit Court which dismissed the bill, for the purpose of enabling the complainant to make the other two nephews of the testatrix parties.

The court did not consider it necessary to make the residuary legatees parties; in a proceeding the sole object of which was to ascertain and distribute among the nephews of the testatrix, the amount to which they were entitled, for the expenses of education. The residuary legatees have undoubtedly an interest in reducing every demand on the estate. Whatever remains, sinks into the residuum; and that residuum is diminished as well by the claims of creditors and specific legatees, as by this. In all such cases the executors represent the residuary legatees, and guard their interests. It is a part of that duty which requires them to protect the interests of the estate. In such suits, the residuary legatees are never made parties. To require it would be an intolerable burden on those who have claims on an estate in the hands of executors.

Dandridge v. Washington's Executors,

(377) 457

5. Where a bill was filed against the stockholders of a voluntary association, for the purposes of banking, and the process was returned "served" upon some of the parties named in the bill, and as to others, who were not within the reach of the process, "not found;" the court stated, that it was not meant to say that in cases of this nature it is necessary to bring all the stockholders before the court, before any decree can be made. It is well known that there are cases in which a court of equity dispenses with such a proceeding, when the parties are very numerous and unknown; and the adoption of the rule would evidently impede, if not defeat the purposes of justice.

Mandeville et al. v. Riggs,

(487) 494

6. Upon the death of some of the parties to the bill who had been served with process, the bill ought to have been revived against their personal representatives, if they could be brought before the court; unless some good reason, such as absolute insolvency, could be assigned to justify the decision.

7. One of the great principles upon which courts of equity generally require all parties, who are known and within the reach of its jurisdiction, to be made parties, is to prevent future litigation and to take away multiplicity of suits. There are exceptions, it is true, to the rule, but they are founded upon special considerations.

In a bill filed in the Circuit Court of Alexandria County, in the District of Columbia, against the stockholders of an association for banking purposes, the bill was dismissed as to those stockholders who were named in the bill, but were not served with process; and it was held to be error. 10. The complainants in the Circuit Court were proved to be the regularly appointed committee of a voluntary society of Lutherans in actual possession of the premises, and acting by their direction to prevent a disturbance of that possession; under the circumstances of the case, there does not appear to be a serious objection to their right to maintain a suit for a perpetual injunction against the heirs of the donor, who sought to regain the property, and to disturb their possession.

11. The only difficulty which presents itself upon the question, whether the complainants in the Circuit Court have shown in themselves sufficient authority to maintain their suit, is, that it is not evidenced by any formal vote or writing. If it were necessary to decide the case on this point under all the circumstances, it might be fairly presumed. But this is not necessary; because this is one of those cases in which certain persons belonging to a voluntary society, and having a common interest, may sue in behalf of themselves and others, having the like interests as part of the same society, for purposes common to all, and beneficial to all.

12. There is no doubt but that under the general prayer in a bill in chancery for general relief, other relief may be granted than that which is particularly prayed for; but such relief must be agreeable to the case made by the bill.

English et al. v. Forall,

(595) 531

13. A marriage settlement provided that the trustees, after the death of the husband, should stand possessed of a bond executed to them by the husband, and of the sum of $37,038 to be received by them upon trust to place out the same, when it shall come into their hands, at interest, on freehold securities, or invest it, or any part of it, in the purchase of stock of the United States of North America, or bank stock there, with the approbation of the wife; and to call in and replace the same, and re-invest the same and the produce thereof, from time to time, upon or in such securities, or stock, with the approbation of the wife. It is not an unreasonable interpretation to say that the wife, who survived the husband, was to have a controlling agency, within the limitation prescribed by the contract. She has not an arbitrary and unlimited discretion. The investment is restricted to three objects: freehold securities, United States stock, or bank stock; and the trustees are not authorized to make any other investment. The trustees are bound to make the investment in any one of the funds mentioned, which the wife might request or direct.

Id.

(Ib.) 531

14. The husband by his will confirmed the marriage settlement, and he further declared "that if the sum of $37,038 secured to be paid to the trustees should at any time be found insufficient to raise and bring into the hands of the trustees the clear annual sum of $2,222.22, the annuity secured to be paid to his wife by the settlement, then the trustees of his will shall, from time to time, transfer to themselves, as trustees of the settlement, out of the residuum of his estate, such sum or sums of money as may, from time to time, be found necessary to make up any deficiency there may happen to be between the current amount of the interest and produce of the principal sum, and the amount of the annuity; so that in no event less than $2,222.22 shall be raised annually for his wife, or for her benefit in the United States." The personal estate of the husband, exclusive of the sum placed in the hands of the trustees of the annuity, was so invested as to produce six per centum per annum, and the direction of the wife to keep invested at six per cent. stock of the United States the $37,038, produced a deficiency in the annuity, which she claimed to have made up from the residuary estate. The wife has a right to claim this deficiency to be so made up.

CHANCERY AND CHANCERY PRACTICE—4.

1. Where a bill was filed to compel the execution of securities for money loaned, which securities, it was alleged in the bill, were promised to be given upon particular real estate purchased by the money loaned, and the complainants had omitted to make the prior mortgagees of the premises on which the securities were required to be given, parties to the bill, the court said: It has been urged in reply to those grounds of reversal for want of parties or for want of due maturation for a final hearing, that nothing is ordered to be mortgaged or sold besides the interest of the party who is ordered to execute the mortgage, or whose interest is to be sold, whatever that may be. But this we conceive to be an insufficient answer. It is not enough that a court of equity causes nothing but the interest of the proper party to change owners. Its decree should terminate and not instigate litigation. Its sales should tempt men to sober investment, and not to wild speculation. Its process should act upon known and definite interests, and not upon such as admit of no medium of estimation. It has means of reducing every right to certainty and precision, and is, therefore, bound to employ these means in the exercise of its jurisdiction.

Caldwell v. Taggart et al.,

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

2. The general rule is, that however numerous the persons interested in the subject of a suit, they must all be made parties—plaintiff or defendant—in order that a complete decree may be made; it being the constant aim of a court of equity to do complete justice, by embracing the whole subjects; deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suits; to make the performance of the order perfectly safe to those who have to obey it, and to prevent future litigation.

Caldwell v. Taggart et al., (190) 288

3. Where in the course of proceedings in a suit in chancery in the Circuit Court it is apparent that the father has not presented the interests of his children for protection, the court said: Although there is no appeal taken in behalf of the children, the court, while interfering to prevent the breach of a trust in behalf of the father, can hardly be expected to pass over without noticing an omission in the father, amounting to a breach of trust, to the prejudice of his infant children.

Id. 828

4. The complainants, in the Circuit Court of Ohio, filed a bill to enforce the specific performance of a contract. The bill states that there is a surplus of several hundred acres, and by actual measurement it is found to be eight hundred and seventy-six acres; the patent having been granted for one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres beyond the quantity mentioned in the contract.

The powers of a court of chancery to enforce a specific execution of contracts are very valuable and important. For in many cases where the remedy at law for damages is not lost, complete justice cannot be done without a specific execution. And it has been almost as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree a specific execution of a contract for the purchase of lands (where in its nature and circumstances it is unobjectionable) as it is to give damages at law where an action will lie for a breach of the contract. But this power is to be exercised under the sound discretion of the court, with an eye to the substantial justice of the case.

King v. Hamilton, (328) 875

5. When a party comes into a court of chancery seeking equity, he is bound to do justice, and not ask the court to become the instrument of iniquity. When a contract is hard and destitute of all equity, the court will leave parties to their remedy at law; and if that has been lost by negligence, they must abide by it.

Id.

(Id.) 875

6. It is a settled rule in a bill for specific performance of a contract to allow a defendant to show that it is unreasonable, or unconscientious, or founded in mistake or other circumstances leading satisfactorily to the conclusion that the granting of the prayer of the bill would be inequitable and unjust. Gross negligence on the part of the complainant has great weight in cases of this kind. A party, to entitle himself to the aid of a court of chancery for a specific execution of a contract, should show himself ready and desirous to perform his part.

CHARITABLE USES—2.

A lot of ground had, in the original plan of an addition to Georgetown, been marked "for the Lutheran Church;" and by the German Lutherans of the place, had been used as a place of burial from the dedication, and who had erected a school-house on it, but no church; exercising acts of protection and ownership over it at some periods, by committees appointed by the German Lutherans, the original owners acquiescing in the same. This may be considered as a dedication of the lot to public and pious uses; and although the German Lutherans were not incorporated, nor were there any persons who as trustees could hold the property, the appropriation was also valid under the bill of rights of Maryland. The bill of rights, to this extent at least, recognizes the doctrines of the statute of Elizabeth for charitable uses; under which, it is well known, that such uses would be upheld, although there was no specific grantee or trustee. This might at all times have been enforced as a charitable and pious use, through the intervention of the government, as parens patrie, by its attorney-general or other law officer. It was originally consecrated for a religious purpose. It has become Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

CITY OF WASHINGTON—4.

1. In 1822 Congress passed an Act authorizing the corporation of Washington to drain the ground in and near certain public reservations, and to improve and ornament certain parts of the public reservations. The corporation are empowered to make an agreement by which parts of the location of the canal shall be changed for the purpose of draining and drying the low grounds near the Pennsylvania Avenue, &c. To effect these objects, the corporation is authorized to lay off in building lots certain parts of the public reservations No. 10, 11 and 12, and of other squares, and also a part of B street, as laid out and designated in the original plan of the city, which lots they may sell at auction and apply the proceeds to those objects, and afterwards to inclosing, planting and improving other reservations, and building bridges, &c., the surplus, if any, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The act authorizes the heirs, &c., of the former proprietors of the land on which the city was laid out, who may consider themselves injured by the purposes of the act, to institute in the Circuit Court a bill in equity, in the nature of a petition of right, against the United States, setting forth the grounds of any claim they may consider themselves entitled to make, to be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity; the court to hear and determine upon the claim of the plaintiffs, and what portion, if any, of the money arising from the sale of the lots they may be entitled to, with a right of appeal to this court. The plaintiffs, Van Ness and wife, filed their bill against the United States and the corporation of Washington, claiming title to the lots which had been thus sold, under David Burns, the original proprietor of that part of the city, and father of one of the plaintiffs, on the ground that by the agreement between the United States and the original proprietors, upon laying out the city, those reservations and streets were forever to remain for public use, and without the consent of the proprietors could not be otherwise appropriated or sold for private use; that the Act of Congress was a violation of that contract; that by such sale and appropriation for private use the right of the United States thereto was determined, or that the original proprietors reacquired a right to have the reservations, &c., laid out in building lots for their joint and equal benefit with the United States, or that they were in equity entitled to the whole or a moiety of the proceeds of the sales of the lots. Held, that no rights or claims exist in the former proprietors or their heirs, and that the proceedings of the corporation of Washington, under and in conformity with the provisions of the act, are valid and effectual for the purposes of the act.

COMMISSION—3.

1. A commission was issued in the name of Richard M. Meade, the name of the party being Richard W. Meade. This is a clerical error in making out the commission and does not affect the execution of the commission.

Keene v. Meade, (6) 583

2. It is not known that there is any practice in the execution or return of a commission, requiring a certificate, in whose handwriting the depositions returned with the commission were set down. All that the commission requires is, that the commissioners, having reduced the depositions taken by them to writing, should send them with the commission under their hands and seals to the judges of the court out of which the commission issued. But it is immaterial in whose handwriting the depositions are, and it cannot be required that they should certify any immaterial fact.

Id. (8) 584

3. A certificate by the commissioners, that A. B. whom they were going to employ as a clerk had been sworn, admits of no other reasonable interpretation than that A. B. was the person appointed by them as clerk.

Id. (9) 584

4. It is not necessary to return with the commission the form of the oath administered by the commissioners to the witnesses. When the commissioners certify the witnesses were sworn, and the interrogatories annexed to the commission were all put to them, it is presumed that they were sworn and examined as to all their knowledge of the facts.

COMMON LAW—2.

The common law of England is not to be taken in all respects to be that of America. Our ancestors brought with them its general principles, and claimed it as their birthright. But they brought with them and adopted only that portion which was applicable to their situation.

COMMON LAW—3.

By "common law," the framers of the Constitution of the United States meant, what the Constitution denominated in the third article, "law;" not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were regarded, and equitable remedies were administered; or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law and of maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit.

CONDITION—2.

If a party to a contract, who is entitled to the benefit of a condition, upon the performance of which his responsibility is to arise, dispense with it, or, by any act of his own, prevent the performance; the opposite party is excused from proving a strict compliance with the conditions. Thus, if the precedent act is to be performed at a certain time or place, and a strict performance of it is prevented by the absence of the party who has a right to claim it, the law will not permit him to set up the nonperformance of the condition as a bar to the responsibility which his part of the contract had imposed upon him.

Williams v. The Bank of the United States, (102) 362

CONDITION—3.

1. The testator was seized of a very large real and personal estate in the States of Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee. After making by his will in addition to her dower, a very liberal provision for his wife for her life out of part of his real estate, and devising, in case of his having a child or children, the whole of his estate to such child or children, with the exception of the provision for his wife, and certain other bequests, his will declares: "In case of having no children, I then leave and bequeath all my real estate at the death of my wife to William King, son of brother James King, on condition of his marrying a daughter of William Trigg's and my niece Rachel, his wife, lately Rachel Finlay, in trust for the eldest son or issue of said marriage; and in case such marriage should not take place, Leave and bequeath said estate to any child, giving preference to age, of said William and Rachel Trigg, that will marry a child of my brother James King's, or of sister Elizabeth's, wife to John Mitchell, and to their issue." The testator died without issue. He survived his father, and had brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood who survived him, and also a sister of the whole blood, Elizabeth, the wife of John Mitchell, who died before him. William and Rachel Trigg never had a daughter, but had four sons, James King, the father of William King, the devisee, had only one daughter, who intermarried with Alexander M'Call. Elizabeth, the wife of John Mitchell, had two daughters, both of whom are married, one to William Heiskill, the other to Abraham B. Trigg.

BY THE COURT. We have found no case in which a general devise in words, importing a present interest in a will making no other disposition of the property on a condition which may be performed at any time has been construed, from the mere circumstance that the estate is given on condition, to require that the condition must be performed before the estate can vest. There are many cases in which the contrary principle has been decided. The condition on which the devise to William King depended, is a condition subsequent.

Finlay et al. v. King's Lessee, (377) 712

2. It is certainly well settled that there are no technical appropriate words which always determine whether a devise be on a condition precedent or subsequent. The same words have been determined differently, and the question is always a question of intention. If the language of the particular clause, or of the whole will, shows that the act upon which the estate depends must be performed before the estate can vest, the condition of course is precedent; and unless it is performed, the devisee can take nothing. If, on the contrary, the act does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, if this is to be collected from the whole will, the condition is subsequent.

Id. (374) 711

3. It is a general rule that a devise in words of the present time, as, "I give to A my lands in B," imports, if no contrary intent appears, an immediate interest, which vests in the devisee on the death of the testator. It is also a general rule that if an estate be given on a condition for the performance of which no time is limited, the devisee has his life for performance. The result of these two principles seems to be, that a devise to A, on condition that he shall marry B, if uncontrolled by other words, takes effect immediately, and the devisee performs the condition if he marry B at any time during his life. The condition is subsequent.

Id. (376) 712

4. As the devise in the will to William King was on a condition subsequent, it may be construed so far as respects the time of taking the possession, as if it had been unconditional. The condition opposes no obstacle to his immediate possession, if the intent of the testator shall require that construction.

Id. (378) 712

5. The introductory clause in the will states: "I, William King, have thought proper to make and ordain this to be my last will and testament, leaving and bequeathing my worldly estate in the manner following." These words are entitled to considerable influence in a question of doubtful intent, in a case where the whole property is given, and the question arises between the heir and devisee respecting the interest devised. The words of the particular clause also carry the whole estate from the heir, but they fix the death of testator's wife as the time when the devisee shall be entitled to possession. They are "in case of having no children, I then leave and bequeath all my real estate, at the death of my wife, to William King, son of brother James King." The whole estate is devised to William King, but the possession of that part of it which is given to the wife or others for life, is postponed until her death.

CONSIDERATION—2.

Damage to the promisee constitutes as good a consideration as benefit to the promisor.

Townsend v. Sumrall, (182) 390

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

CONSIDERATION—4.

1. It has been long settled that a promise made in consideration of an act which is forbidden by the law is void. It will not be questioned that an act forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, which is the Supreme law, is against law.

Craig et al. v. State of Missouri, (431) 910

2. A promissory note given for certificates issued at the loan-office of Chariton in Missouri, payable to the State of Missouri, under the Act of the Legislature "establishing loan-offices," is void.

Id. (Ib.) 910

3. A contract was made for rebuilding Fort Washington, by M., a public agent, and a deputy-quartermaster-general, with B.; in the profits of which M. was to participate. False measures of the work were attempted to be imposed on the government, the success of which was prevented by the vigilance of the accounting officers of the Treasury. A bill was filed to compel an alleged partner in the contract to account for and pay to one of the partners in the transaction, one-half of the loss sustained in the execution of the contract.

Held, that to state such a case is to decide it. Public morals, public justice, and the well established principles of all judicial tribunals, alike forbid the interposition of courts of justice to lend their aid to purposes like this. To enforce a contract which begun with the corruption of a public officer, and progressed in the practice of known willful deception in its execution, can never be approved or sanctioned by any court.

Bartle v. Coleman, (184) 825

4. The law leaves the parties to such a contract as it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, it is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply practiced fraud. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself by an exertion of its powers to shift the loss from one to the other, or to equalize the benefits or burthens which may have resulted from the violation of every principle of morals and of law.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

1. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which forbids the Legislature of a State to exercise judicial functions.

Satterlee v. Matthewson, (413) 469

2. There is no part of the Constitution of the United States which applies to a State law which divested rights vested by law in an individual, provided its effect be not to impair the obligation of a contract.

Id. (Ib.) 469

3. A tax imposed by a law of any State of the United States, or under the authority of such a law, on stock issued for loans made to the United States, is unconstitutional.

Weston et al. v. The City Council of Charleston, (449) 481

4. It is not the want of original power in an independent sovereign State to prohibit loans to a foreign government, which restrains the State Legislature from direct opposition to those made by the United States. The restraint is imposed by our Constitution. The American people have conferred the power of borrowing money on the government, and by making that government supreme, have shielded its action in the exercise of that power, from the action of the local governments. The grant of the power, and the declaration of supremacy, are a declaration that no such restraining or controlling power shall be exercised.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATE STATUTES—2.

1. The Act of the Assembly of the State of Delaware, by which the construction of the dam erected by the plaintiffs was authorized, shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks passing through a deep level marsh, adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks, must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come in collision with the powers of the general government, are, undoubtedly, within those which are reserved to the States. The measure authorized by this act, stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgement, unless it comes in conflict with the Constitution, or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens; of which this court can take no cognizance.

Willson v. The Black Bird Creek Marsh Company, (251) 414

2. If Congress had passed any act, in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was, to control State Legislation over these small navigable creeks, into which the tide ebbs and flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the middle and southern States, the court would feel not much difficulty in saying that a State law, coming in conflict with such act, would be void. But Congress has passed no such act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the law to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States; a power which has not been so exercised as to affect this question.

3. S. and M. held land in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, in common, under a Connecticut title. A division of the land was made between them, and S. became the tenant of M. of his part of the land thus set off in severalty, under a lease, to be terminated on a notice of one year. S. afterwards obtained a Pennsylvania title to the land leased to him by M., and on a trial in an ejectment for the land, brought by M. against S., the Court of Common Pleas of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, held that S., having held the land as tenant of M., could not set up a title against his landlord. Upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in 1825, it was held that "the relation between landlord and tenant could not exist between persons holding under a Connecticut title." The Legislature of Pennsylvania, on the 8th of April, 1826, passed an Act declaring that "the relation of landlord and tenant should exist and be held as fully and effectually between Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania claimants, as between citizens of the Commonwealth." The case came again before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Bradford County in favor of M., the landlord, was affirmed; that court having decided that the Act of Assembly of the 8th of April, 1826, was a constitutional act, and did not impair the validity of any contract. S. brought a writ of error to this court, claiming that the Act of the Assembly of Pennsylvania, of the 8th of April, 1826, was unconstitutional. Held, that the act was constitutional.

Satterlee v. Matthewson, (380) 458

4. In the case of Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 87), it was stated by the Chief Justice, that it might well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government do not prescribe some limits to the legislative power, and he asks: "If any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation?" It is nowhere intimated in that opinion, that a State statute which divests a vested right, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

5. A tax imposed by a law of any State of the United States, or under the authority of such a law, on stock issued for loans made to the United States, is unconstitutional.

6. It is not the want of original power in an independent sovereign State to prohibit loans to a foreign government, which restrains the State Legislature from direct opposition to those made by the United States. The restraint is imposed by our Constitution. The American people have conferred the power of borrowing money on the government, and by making that government supreme, have shielded its action in the exercise of that power, from the action of the local governments. The grant of the power, and the declaration of supremacy, are a declaration that no such restraining or controlling power shall be exercised.

7. The lands of an intestate descend not to the administrator, but to the heir; they vest in him, liable to the debts of his ancestor, and subject to be sold for those debts. The administrator has no estate in the land, but a power to sell under the authority of the Court of Common Pleas. This is not an independent power, to be exercised at discretion, when the exigency in his opinion may require it; but it is conferred by the court, in a state of things prescribed by the law. The order of the court is a prerequisite, indispensable to the very existence of the power; and if the law which authorizes the court to make the order, be repealed, the power to sell can never come into existence. The repeal of such a law divests no vested estate, but it is the exercise of a legislative power, which every Legislature possesses. The mode of subjecting the property of a debtor to the demands of a creditor, must always depend on the wisdom of the Legislature.

The Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley's heirs, (523) 507

8. J. J. died in New Hampshire, seized of real estate in Rhode Island, having devised the same to his daughter, an infant. His executrix proved the will in New Hampshire, and obtained a license from a probate court in that State, to sell the real estate of the testator for the payment of debts. She sold the real estate in Rhode Island for that purpose, and conveyed the same by deed; giving a bond to procure a confirmation of the conveyance by the Legislature of Rhode Island. The proceeds of the sale were appropriated to pay the debts of the intestate. Held, that the Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island, which confirmed the title of the purchasers, was valid.

Wilkinson v. Leland et al. (657) 553

9. That government can scarcely be deemed to be free, where the rights of property are left solely dependent on the will of the legislative body, without any restraint. The fundamental maxims of a free government seem to require that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred. At least, no court of justice in this country would be justified in assuming, that the power to violate or disregard them, a power so repugnant to the common principles of justice and civil liberty, lurked under any general grant of legislative authority; or ought to be implied from any general expressions of the will of the people. The people ought not to be presumed to part with rights so vital to their security and well-being, without very strong and direct expressions of such an intention.

Id. (Ib.) 553

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—3.

1. The plaintiff in error claimed to recover the land in controversy, having derived his title under a patent granted by the State of New York to John Cornelius. He insisted that the patent created a contract between the State and the patentee, his heirs and assigns, that they should enjoy the land free from any legislative regulations to be made in violation of the constitution of the State, and that an act passed by the Legislature of New York, subsequent to the patent, did violate that contract. Under that act commissioners were appointed to investigate the contending titles to all lands held under such patents as that granted to John Cornelius, and by their proceedings, without the aid of a jury, the title of the defendants in error was established against, and defeating the title under a deed made by John Cornelius, the patentee, and which deed was executed under the patent. This is not a case within the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits a State from passing laws which shall impair the obligation of contracts. The only contract made by the State is a grant to John Cornelius, his heirs and assigns, of the land. The patent contains no covenant to do or not to do any further act in relation to the land; and the court are not inclined to create a contract by implication. The Act of the Legislature of New York does not attempt to take the land from the patentee, the grant remains in full effect; and the proceedings of the commissioners under the law, operated upon titles derived under, and not adversely to the patent.

Hart v. Lamphire, (289) 682

2. It is within the undoubted powers of State Legislatures to pass recording acts by which the elder grantee shall be postponed to a younger, if the prior deed is not recorded within a limited time; and the power is the same whether the deed is dated before or after the reording act. Though the effect of such a deed is to render the prior deed fraudulent and void against a subsequent purchaser, it is not a law violating the obligation of contracts. So, too, is the power to pass limitation laws. Reasons of sound policy have led to the general adoption of laws of this description, and their validity cannot be questioned. The time and manner of their operation, the exceptions to them, and the acts from which the time limited shall begin to run, will generally depend on the sound discretion of the Legislature according to the nature of the titles, the situation of the country, and the emergency which leads to their enactment. Cases may occur where the provisions of a law on these subjects may be so unreasonable as to amount to a denial of a right, and to call for the interposition of this court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—4.

1. In its enlarged and perhaps literal sense, the term "bill of credit" may comprehend any instrument by which a State engages to pay money at a future day; thus including a certificate given for money borrowed. But the language of the Constitution itself, and the mischief to be prevented, equally limit the interpretation of the terms. The word "emit" is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received, or for money borrowed for present use. Nor are instruments executed for such purposes, in common language, denominated "bills of credit." "To emit bills of credit," conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the community, for its ordinary purposes, as money; which paper is redeemable at a future day. This is the sense in which the terms have always been understood.

Craig v. The State of Missouri, (431) 910

2. The Constitution considers the emission of bills of credit, and the enactment of tender laws, as distinct operations, independent of each other, which may be separately performed. Both are forbidden. To sustain the one because it is not also the other; to say that bills of credit may be emitted, if they be not made a tender in payment of debts; is, in effect, to expunge that distinct independent prohibition, and to read the clause as if it had been entirely omitted.

Id. (Ib.) 910

3. On the 27th day of June, 1821, the Legislature of the State of Missouri passed an Act, entitled "An Act for the establishment of loan-offices;" by the third section of which the officers of the Treasury of the State, under the direction of the Governor, were required to issue certificates to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, of denominations not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents, in the following form: "This certificate shall be receivable at the treasury of any of the loan-offices in the State of Missouri, in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State, for the sum of — dollars, with interest for the same, at the rate of two per centum per annum from this date." These certificates were to be receivable at the treasury, and by tax-gatherers and other public officers, in payment of taxes, or moneys due or to become due to the State or to any town or county therein, and by all officers, civil and military, in the State, in discharge of salaries and fees of office; and in payment for salt made at the salt springs owned by the State, and to be afterwards leased by the authority of the Legislature. The twenty-third section of the act pledges certain property of the State for the redemption of these certificates; and the law authorizes the Governor to negotiate a loan of silver or gold for the same purpose. A provision is made in the law for the gradual withdrawal of the certificates from circulation; and all the certificates have since been redeemed. The commissioners of the loan-offices were authorized to make loans of the certificates to citizens of the State, assigning to each district a proportion of the amount of the certificates, to be secured by mortgage or personal security; the loans to bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and the loans on personal property to be for less than two hundred dollars. Held, that the certificates issued under the authority of the law of Missouri were "bills of credit"; and that their emission was prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall emit "bills of credit."

to the State of Missouri, under the Act of the Legislature "establishing loan-offices," is void.

Craig v. The State of Missouri, (481) 910

5. The action was assumpsit on a promissory note, and the record stated "that neither party having required a jury, the cause was submitted to the court; and the court having seen and heard the evidence, the court found that the defendants did assume as the plaintiff had declared; that the consideration for the note and the assumpsit was for loan-office certificates loaned by the State of Missouri at her loan-office in Chariton, which certificates were issued under "an Act for establishing loan-offices, &c." Held, that it could not be doubted that the declaration is on a note given in pursuance of the act of Missouri; and that under the plea of non assumpsit the defendants were at liberty to question the validity of the consideration which was the foundation of the contract, and the constitutionality of the law in which it originated. The record thus exhibiting the case, gives jurisdiction to this court over the case, on a writ of error prosecuted by the defendants to this court from the Supreme Court of Missouri, under the provision of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

6. Everything which disaffirms the contract, everything which shows it to be void, may be given in evidence on the general issue, in an action of assumpsit.

7. In 1791 the Legislature of Rhode Island granted a charter of incorporation to certain individuals who had associated for the purpose of banking. They were incorporated by the name of "The President, Directors and Company of the Providence Bank," with the ordinary powers of such associations. In 1822 the Legislature passed an act imposing a tax on every bank in the State, except the Bank of the United States. The Providence Bank refused the payment of the tax, alleging that the act which imposed it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, as it impaired the obligation of the contract created by the charter of incorporation. Held, that the Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island, imposing a tax, which, under the law, was assessed on the Providence Bank, does not impair the obligation of the contract created by the charter granted to the bank.

The Providence Bank v. Billings and Pitman (514) 939

8. It has been settled that a contract entered into between a State and an individual is as fully protected by the prohibitions contained in the tenth section, first article of the Constitution, as a contract between two individuals; and it is not denied that a charter incorporating a bank is a contract.

Id. (Ib.) 939

9. The power of taxing moneyed corporations has been frequently exercised: and has never before, so far as is known, been resisted. Its novelty, however, furnishes no conclusive argument against it.

Id. (Ib.) 939

10. That the taxing power is of vital importance; that it is essential to the existence of government; are truths which it cannot be necessary to re-affirm. They are acknowledged and asserted by all. It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed. We will not say that a State may not relinquish it; that a consideration sufficiently valuable to induce a partial release of it may not exist; but as the whole community is interested in retaining it undiminished, that the community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon it does not appear.

Id. (Ib.) 939

11. The power of legislation, and consequently of taxation, operate on all the persons and property belonging to the body politic. This is an original principle, which has its foundation in society itself. It is granted by all, for the benefit of all. It resides in government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved where property of any description, or the right to use it in any manner, is granted to individuals or corporate bodies.

Id. (Ib.) 939

12. However absolute the right of an individual may be, it is still in the nature of that right that it is still in the nature of that right that it must bear a portion of the public burdens, and that portion must be determined by the Legislature. This vital Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

power may be abused; but the Constitution of the United States was not intended to furnish the correction of every power which may be committed to the State government. The intrinsic wisdom and justice of the representative body, and its relations with its constituents, furnished the only security, where there is no express contract, against unjust and excessive taxation, as well as against unwise legislation generally.

Id. (Ib.) 939

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—1.

1. It is a general rule in the construction of public statutes that the word "may" is to be construed "must" in all cases where the Legislature mean to impose a positive and absolute duty, and not merely to give a discretionary power. And in all cases, the construction should be such as carries into effect the true intent and meaning of the Legislature in the enactment.

Jackson v. Clark et al., (634) 293

8. The reservation made by the law of Virginia of 1783, ceding to Congress the territory north-west of the river Ohio, is not a reservation of the whole tract of country between the river Scioto and Little Miami. It is a reservation of only so much of it as may be necessary to make up the deficiency of good lands in the country set apart for the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on the continental establishment, on the south-east side of the Ohio. The residue of the lands are ceded to the United States as a common fund for those States who were, or might become, members of the Union, to be disposed of for that purpose.

Id. (635) 293

9. Although the military rights constituted the primary claim upon the trust, that claim was, according to the intention of the parties, so to be satisfied as still to keep in view the interests of the Union, which were also a vital object of the trust. This was only to be effected by prescribing the time in which the lands to be appropriated by these claimants, should be separated from the general mass, so as to enable the government to apply the residue to the general purposes of the trust.

Id. (Ib.) 293

10. If the right existed in Congress to prescribe a time within which military warrants should be located, the right to annex conditions to its extension follows as a necessary consequence.

Id. (Ib.) 293

11. If it be conceded that the proviso in the Act of 2d March, 1807, was not intended for the protection of surveys which were in themselves absolutely void, it must be admitted that it was intended to protect those which were defective, and which might be avoided for irregularity. If this effect be denied to the proviso, it becomes itself a nullity.

Id. (Ib.) 293

12. Lands surveyed are under the law as completely withdrawn from the common mass as lands patented. It cannot be said that the prohibition, that "no location shall be made on tracts of land for which patents had previously been issued, or which had been previously surveyed," was intended only for valid and regular surveys. They did not require legislative aid. The clause was introduced for the protection of defective entries and surveys, which might be defeated by entries made in quiet times.

6. The 2d, 3d and 4th sections of the Act of January 6, 1800, entitled "An Act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts," make provision for the discharge of persons confined under execution; and the 5th section extends "the privileges and relief" of that act to persons in confinement, against whom judgment is obtained, but no execution issued. Under the provisions in favor of persons charged in execution, on the day of arrest a notice may be served upon the person at whose suit they are confined, and at the end of thirty days they may be discharged. By the 5th section it is enacted, "that any person imprisoned upon process issuing from any court of the United States, except at the suit of the United States, in any civil action, against whom judgment has been or shall be recovered, shall be entitled to the privileges and relief provided by this act, after the expiration of thirty days from the time such judgment has been or shall be recovered; though the creditor should not within that time sue out his execution, and charge the debtor therewith." It has been argued that, under this section, the defendant must remain in prison thirty days after judgment, before he can sue out his notice to the plaintiff; thus requiring him to remain sixty days in confinement, in the cases which come under this section; whereas he remains but thirty days, when confined under execution. There can be no reason for this distinction; and in favor of liberty, and with a view to consistency, the construction should be otherwise. If such were the true construction, the relief would not be the same as is extended to debtors of the other class. The day of entering judgment under the 5th section, is the day that corresponds to the day of arrest, under the previous provisions of the law; and therefore in thirty days after the judgment, the defendant may be discharged; complying with the other requisitions of the law.

9. The legislative and judicial authority of New Hampshire were bounded by the territory of that State, and could not be rightfully exercised to pass estates lying in another State. The sale of real estate in Rhode Island, by an executrix, under a license granted by a court of probate of New Hampshire, was void; and a deed executed by her of the estate was, proprio vigore, inoperative to pass any title of the testator to any lands described therein.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATE STATUTES—4.

1. The Act of the Legislature of New York of May 1, 1786, gave to the purchasers of forfeited estates the like remedy in case of eviction, for obtaining compensation for the value of their improvements, as is directed in the Act of the 12th of May, 1774. The latter act declares that the person or persons having obtained judgment against such purchasers, shall not have any writ of possession, nor obtained possession of such lands, &c., until he shall have paid to the purchaser of such lands, or persons holding title under him, the value of all improvements made thereon after the passing of the act. Held, that claims of compensation for improvements made under authority of these acts of the Legislature of New York are inconsistent with the provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain of 1783, and should be rejected.

3. There is no statute in Virginia which expressly makes a judgment a lien upon the lands of the debtor. As in England, the lien is the consequence of a right to take out an elegit. During the existence of this, the lien is universally acknowledged. Different opinions seem at different times to have been entertained of the effect of any suspension of this right.

The United States v. Morrison, (124) 804

4. Soon after this case was decided in the Circuit Court for the District of East Virginia, a case was decided in the Court of Appeals of the State, in which this question on the execution law of the State of Virginia was elaborately argued, and deliberately decided. The decision is that the right to take out an elegit is not suspended by suing out a writ of fi fieri facias, and, consequently, that the lien of the judgment continues pending the proceedings on that writ. This court, according to its uniform course, adopts the construction of the act which is made by the highest court of the State.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES OF THE U.S.—3.

1. The offense against the law of the United States, under the seventh section of the Act of Congress, passed the 2d day of March, 1807, entitled "An Act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st of January, 1808," is not that of importing or bringing into the United States persons of color with intent to hold or sell such persons as slaves, but that of hovering on the coast of the United States with such intent; and although it forfeits the vessel and any goods or effects found on board, it is silent as to disposing of the colored persons found on board, any further than to impose a duty upon the officers of armed vessels who make the capture to keep them safely, to be delivered to the overseers of the poor or the governor of the State or persons appointed by the respective States to receive the same.

United States v. Preston, (65) 604

2. The Josefa Segunda, having persons of color on board of her, was, on the 11th of February, 1818, found hovering on the coast of the United States, and was seized and brought into New Orleans, and the vessel and the persons on board were libeled in the District Court of the United States of Louisiana, under the Act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1807. After the decree of condemnation below, but pending the appeal to this court, the sheriff of New Orleans went on, with the consent of all the parties to the proceedings, to sell the persons of color as slaves, and sixty-five thousand dollars, the proceeds, were deposited in the registry of the court to await the final disposal of the law. By the tenth section of the Act of the 30th of April, 1818, the six first sections of the act are repealed, and no provision is made by which the condition of the persons of color found on board a vessel hovering on the coast of the United States is altered from that in which they were placed under the Act of 1807, no power having been given to dispose of them otherwise than to appoint some one to receive them. The seventh section of the Act of 1818 confirms no other sales previously or subsequently made under the State laws, but those for illegal importation, and does not comprise the case of a condemnation under the seventh section. The final condemnation of the persons on board the Josefa Segunda took place in this court on the 13th of March, 1820, after Congress had passed the Act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled "An Act in addition to an act prohibiting the slave trade," by the provisions of which persons of color brought in under any of the acts prohibiting the traffic in slaves, were to be delivered to the President of the United States to be sent to Africa. It could not affect the persons of color.

Id., (66) 605

3. In admiralty cases a decree is not final while an appeal from the same is depending in this court, and any statute which governs the case must be an existing valid statute at the time of affirming the decree below. If, therefore, the persons of color who were on board the Josefa Segunda when captured, had been specifically before the court on the 13th of March, 1820, they must have been delivered up to the President of the United States to be sent to Africa, under the provisions of the Act of the 3d of March, 1819, and, therefore, there is no claim to the proceeds of their sale, under the law of Louisiana, which appropriated the same. The court do not mean to intimate that the United States are entitled to the money, for there was no power to sell the persons of color.

Id., (65) 604

4. Under the thirty-fourth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, the acts of limitations of the several States where no special provision has been made by Congress, form a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, and the same effect is given to them as is given in the State courts.

CONTRACTS—1.

1. Chancery and Chancery Practice, 11.

2. In contracts for the sale of land, by which one agrees to purchase, and the other to convey, the undertakings of the respective parties are always dependent, unless a contrary intimation clearly appears.

The Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, (464) 222

3. Although many nice distinctions are to be found in the books upon the question, whether the covenants or promises of the respective parties to the contract, are to be considered independent or dependent; yet it is evident the intimation of courts have strongly favored the latter construction as being obviously the most just.

Id., (465) 223

4. In such cases, if either vendor or vendee wish to compel the other to fulfil his contract, he must make his part of the agreement precedent, and cannot proceed against the other without actual performance of the agreement on his part, or a tender and refusal.

Id., (Ib.) 223

5. An averment of performance is always made in the declaration upon contracts, containing dependent undertakings, and that averment must be supported by proof.

Id., (Ib.) 223

6. The time fixed for the performance of a contract is, at law, deemed the essence of the contract, and if the seller is not ready and able to perform his part of the agreement on that day, the purchaser may elect to consider the contract at an end. But equity, which from its peculiar jurisdiction, is enabled to examine into the cause of delay in completing a purchase, and to ascertain how far the day named was deemed material by the parties, will, in certain cases, carry the agreement into execution, although the time appointed has elapsed.

Id., (Ib.) 223

7. It may be laid down as a rule that, at law, to entitle the vendor to recover the purchase money, he must aver in his declaration performance of the contract on his part, or an offer to perform, at the day specified for the performance. And this averment must be sustained by proof, unless the tender has been waived by the purchaser.

Id., (467) 224

8. If before the period fixed for the delivery of a deed for lands, the vendee has declared he would not receive it, and that he intended to abandon the contract, it may render a tender of the deed before the institution of the suit unnecessary. But this rule can never apply except in cases where the act which is construed into a waiver, occurs previous to the time for performance.

Id., (Ib.) 224

9. The taking possession of property by the vendee before conveyance, is a circumstance from which is to be inferred that he considered the contract closed, but would not deprive him of the right to relinquish the property, if the vendor could not make a title, or neglected to do so. After a relinquishment for such causes, the vendee could sustain an action to recover back the purchase money, had it been paid.

Id., (468) 224

10. Where the legal title cannot be conveyed to the vendee by the vendor, and the vendee must resort to a court of equity to establish his title, notwithstanding a conveyance of all the right of the vendor to him, the court will not compel him to pay the purchase money. It would be compelling him to take a law suit, instead of the land.

Id., (Ib.) 224

11. When no specific time for the payment of money is fixed in a contract by which the same is to be paid by one party to the other, in judgment of law, the same is payable on demand.

Id., (Ib.) 224

12. In an action upon a written contract, said to have been lost or destroyed, and not for deceit and imposition, the plaintiff's right to recover is measured principally by the contract; and the secondary evidence must prove it as laid in the declaration. The conversation which preceded the agreement, forms no part of it, nor are the propositions or representations which were made at the time, but not introduced into the written contract, to be taken into view in construing the instrument itself. Had the written paper, stated to be lost or mislaid, been produced, neither party could have been permitted to show the party's inducements to make it, or to substitute his understanding for the agreement itself. If he was drawn into it by misrepresentation, that circumstance might furnish him with a different action, but cannot affect this.

Taylor v. Riggs, (598) 278

13. When a written contract is to be proved, not by itself, but by parol testimony, no vague uncertain recollection concerning its stipulations ought to supply the place of the written instrument itself. The substance of the agreement ought to be proved satisfactorily; and if that can not be done, the party is in the condition of every other suitor in court, who makes a claim which he can not support.

Id. (600) 279

14. When parties reduce their contracts to writing, the obligations and rights of each are described by the instrument itself. The safety which is expected from them would be much impaired, if they could be established upon unknown and vague impressions, made by a conversation antecedent to the reduction of the agreement.

Id. (Ib.) 279

CONTRACTS—2.

Upon a deposit being made in the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the cashier gave under his hand a certificate that there had been "deposited to the credit of W. P. & W., $7,730.81, which is subject to their order on presentation of this certificate." The deposit was made in the notes of the bank, and when the same were deposited, and when demand of payment was made, the notes were passing at one-half their nominal value. When the certificate was presented to the bank, the cashier offered to pay the amount in the notes of the bank, but they refused to receive payment in anything but gold or silver. The language of the certificate is expressive of a general, not a specific deposit; and the Act of Incorporation is express, that the bank shall pay and redeem their bills in gold or silver. The transaction, then, was equivalent to receiving and depositing the gold or silver; if the bank did not so understand it they might have refused to receive it; and the plaintiffs would certainly have recovered the gold and silver, to the amount upon the face of the bills.

The Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Wister et al., (325) 439

CONTRACT—3.

See Fraud. 1.

1. A contract was made for rebuilding Fort Washington, by M., a public agent, and a deputy-quartermaster-general, with B.; in the profits of which M. was to participate. False measures of the work were attempted to be imposed on the government, the success of which was prevented by the vigilance of the accounting officers of the treasury. A bill was filed to compel an alleged partner in the contract to account for and pay to one of the partners in the transaction one half of the loss sustained in the execution of the contract.

2. Held, that to state such a case is to decide it. Public morals, public justice, and the well established principles of all judicial tribunals, alike forbid the interposition of courts of justice to lend their aid to purposes like this. To enforce a contract which began with the corruption of a public officer, and progressed in the practice of known willful deception in its execution, can never be approved or sanctioned by any court.

Bartle v. Coleman, (184) 825

3. The law leaves the parties to such a contract as it found them. If either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a particeps criminis, it is but a just infliction for premeditated and deeply practiced fraud. He must not expect that a judicial tribunal will degrade itself, by an exertion of its powers to shift the loss from one to the other, or to equalize the benefits or burdens which may have resulted from the violation of every principle of morals and law.

Id. (Ib.) 825

4. It has been long settled that a promise made in consideration of an act which is forbidden by the law is void. It will not be questioned that an act forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law, is against law.

CORPORATION—1.

A subsequent board of directors of a bank is to be considered as knowing all the circumstances communicated, or known to a previous board.

The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Louisa and Maria Seton, (309) 157

CORPORATION—3.

1. The plaintiff placed goods in the hands of an auctioneer in the city of Alexandria, who sold the same, and became insolvent, having neglected to pay over the proceeds of the sales to the plaintiff. The auctioneer was licensed by the corporation of Alexandria, and the corporation had omitted to take from him a bond with surety for the faithful performance of his duties as auctioneer. This suit was instituted to recover from the corporation of Alexandria the amount of the sales of the plaintiff's goods, lost by the insolvency of the auctioneer, on an alleged liability, in consequence of the corporation having omitted to take a bond from the auctioneer. The power to license auctioneers, and to take bonds for their good behaviour, not being one of the incidents to a corporation, must be conferred by an act of the Legislature; and in executing it, the corporate body must conform to the act. The Legislature of Virginia conferred this power on the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the several corporate towns within that commonwealth, of which Alexandria was then one, "provided that no such license should be granted until the person or persons requesting the same should enter into bond with one or more sufficient sureties, payable to the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of such corporation." This was a limitation of the power.

Fonle v. The Corporation of Alexandria, (407) 722

2. Though the corporate name of Alexandria was "the mayor and commonalty," it is not doubted that a bond taken in pursuance of the act would have been valid.

Id. (Ib.) 722

3. The Act of Congress of 1804, "An Act to amend the charter of Alexandria," does not transfer generally to the common council, the powers of the mayor and commonalty, but the powers given to them are specially enumerated. There is no enumeration of the power to grant licenses to auctioneers. The act amending the charter, changed the corporate body so entirely as to require a new provision to enable it to execute the powers conferred by the law of Virginia. An enabling clause, empowering the common council to act in the particular case, or some general clause which might embrace the particular case, is necessary under the new organization of the corporate body.

Id. (408) 722

4. The common council granted a license to carry on the trade of an auctioneer, which the law did not empower that body to grant. Is the town responsible for losses sustained by individuals from the fraudulent conduct of the auctioneer? He is not the officer or agent of the corporation, but is understood to act for himself as entirely as a tavern-keeper, or any other person who may carry on any business under a license from the corporate body.

Id. (409) 723

5. Is a municipal corporation, established for the general purposes of government, with limited legislative powers, liable for losses consequent on its having misconstrued the extent of its powers, in granting a license which it had no authority to grant, without taking that security for the conduct of the person obtaining the license, which its own ordinances had been supposed to require, and which might protect those who transact business with the persons acting under the clause? The court find no case in which this principle has been affirmed.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Fowle v. The Common Council of Alexandria,

(409) 723

6. That corporations are bound by their contracts is admitted. That money corporations, or those carrying on business for themselves, are liable for torts is well settled. But that a legislative corporation, established as a part of the government of the country, is liable for losses sustained by a nonfeasance, by an omission of the corporate body to observe a law of its own, in which no penalty is provided; is a principle for which we can find no precedent.

CORPORATION—4.

1. The defendant claimed land in controversy under a tax sale which was made by a company incorporated by the Legislature of Connecticut in 1796, called "the proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie," and incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Ohio, passed on the 15th of April, 1803, by the name of "the proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie, called the sufferers' land." In 1806 the Legislature of Ohio imposed a land tax, and authorized the sale of the lands in the State for unpaid taxes, giving to the owners the right to redeem within one year after the determination of their minority. This act was in force in 1808. In 1808 the directors of the company, incorporated by the Legislatures of Connecticut and Ohio, assessed two cents per acre on the lands of the company for the payment of the tax laid by the state of Ohio, and authorized the sale of those lands on which the assessments were not paid. The lands purchased by the defendant were the property of minors at the time of the sale; they having been sold to pay the said assessments under the authority of the directors of the company. Held, that the sale of the land under which the defendant claimed was void.

Beatty v. The Lessee of Knowler, (152) 813

2. That a corporation is strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are specifically conferred on it, will not be denied. The exercise of the corporate franchise, being restrictive of individual rights, cannot be extended beyond the letter and spirit of the act of incorporation.

Id.

(Ib.) 813

3. From a careful inspection of the whole act, it clearly appears that the incorporation of the company was designed to enable the proprietors to accomplish specific objects, and that no more power was given than was considered necessary to attain those objects.

Id.

(Ib.) 813

4. The words, "all necessary expenses of the company," cannot be construed to enlarge the power to tax, which is given for specific purposes. A tax by the State is not necessary expense of the company, within the meaning of the act. Such an expense can only result from the action of the company in the exercise of its corporate powers.

Id.

(Ib.) 813

5. The provision in the tenth section, "that the directors shall have power to do whatever shall appear to them to be necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering of the interests of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State," was not intended to give unlimited power, but the exercise of a discretion within the scope of the authority conferred.

Id.

(Ib.) 813

6. The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collected and changing body of men. Any privileges which may exempt it from the burdens common to individuals, do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist.

Providence Bank v. Billing and Pittman,

COSTS—3.

Costs and expenses are not matters positively limited by law, but are allowed in the exercise of a sound discretion of the court, and no appeal lies from a mere decree respecting costs and expenses.

Canter v. The American and Ocean Insurance Company,

(319) 692

COURTS—1.

1. It is, doubtless, within the province of a court, Peters 1, 2, 3, 4. U. S., Book, in the exercise of its discretion, to sum up the facts in the case to the jury; and submit them, with the inferences of law deducible therefrom, to the free judgment of the jury. But, care must be taken, in all such cases, to separate the law from the facts, and to leave the latter in unequivocal terms to the jury, as their true and peculiar province.

M'Lanahan v. The Universal Insurance Company,

(182) 104

2. Little stress ought to be laid upon general expressions falling from judges, in the course of trials. Where the facts are not disputed, the judge often suggests in a strong and pointed manner, his opinion as to their materiality and importance, and his leading opinion of the conclusion to which the facts ought to conduct the jury. This ought not to be deemed an intentional withdrawal of the facts, or the inferences deducible therefrom, from the cognizance of the jury, but rather as an expression of opinion addressed to the discretion of counsel, whether it would be worth while to proceed further in the cause. And the like expression in summing up any cause to the jury, must be understood by them merely as a strong exposition of the facts, not designed to overrule their verdict, but to assist them in forming it. And there is the less objection to this course in the English practice; because, if the summing up has had an undue influence, the mistake is put right by a new trial, upon an application to the discretion of the whole court. This is so familiarly known, that it needs only to be stated, to be at once admitted.

Id.

3. Where the defendant had reserved a right to move the court to exclude any part of the plaintiff's evidence, which he might choose to designate as incompetent, and it did not appear from the bill of exceptions, that he designated any particular piece or part of the evidence as objectionable, and moved the court to exclude the whole, or to instruct the jury that it was insufficient to prove title in the lessors of the plaintiff; this could not be done on the ground of incompetency, unless the whole was incompetent. The court is not bound to do more than respond to the motion, in the terms in which it is made. Courts of justice are not obliged to modify the propositions submitted by counsel, so as to make them fit the case. If they do not fit, that is enough to authorize their rejection.

A special verdict was found by the jury, upon which judgment was to be entered according as the opinion of the court might be upon the construction of a certain deed, which deed was referred to, and made part of the special finding of the jury, but was not contained in the record thereof. A deed formed a part of a bill of exceptions taken to the opinion of the court, upon a motion for a new trial; which bill of exceptions with the said deed, was contained in the record. The court cannot judicially know that this is the same deed which is referred to in the verdict of the jury, or what are the other evidences of title connected with it.

COURTS—2.

1. It is no ground of reversal, that the court below omitted to give directions to the jury upon any points of law which might arise in the cause, where it was not requested by either party at the trial. It is sufficient that the court has given no erroneous directions.

Pennock et al. v. Dialogue,

(16) 332

2. If either party considers any point presented by the evidence omitted in the charge of the court, it is competent for such party to require an opinion from the court upon that point. 4. In a controversy between two nations concerning national boundary, it is scarcely possible that the courts of either should refuse to abide by the measures adopted by its own government. There being no common tribunal to decide between them, each determines for itself on its own rights; and if they cannot adjust their differences peaceably, the right remains with the strongest. The judiciary is not that department of the government, to which the assertion of its interests against foreign powers is confided; and its duty commonly is to decide upon individual rights, according to those principles which the political departments of the nation have established. If the course of the nation has been a plain one, its courts would hesitate to pronounce it erroneous.

6. After the acts of sovereign power over the territory in dispute with Spain, which have been exercised by the Legislature and government of the United States, asserting the American construction of the treaty by which the government claims it; to maintain the opposite construction in its own courts would certainly be an anomaly in the history and practice of nations. If those departments which are entrusted with the foreign intercourse of the nation, which assert and maintain its interests against foreign powers, have unequivocally asserted its rights of dominion over a country of which it is in possession, and which it claims under a treaty; if the Legislature has acted on the construction thus asserted; it is not in its own courts that this construction is to be denied.

10. That a court of record, whose proceedings are to be proved by the record alone, should, at a subsequent term, determine that an order was made at a previous term, of which no trace could be found on its records, and that, too, after the repeal of the law which gave authority to make such an order; is a proceeding of so much delicacy and danger, which is liable to so much abuse, that some of the court question the existence of the power.

Id. (Ib.) 506

11. The judicial department of every government is the rightful expositor of its laws, and emphatically of its supreme law. If in a case depending before any court a legislative act shall conflict with the Constitution, it is admitted that the court must exercise its judgment on both, and that the Constitution must control the act. The court must determine whether a repugnancy does, or does not exist, and in making this determination must construe both instruments. That its construction of the one is authority, while its construction of the other is to be disregarded, is a proposition for which this court can perceive no reason.

12. When the court was asked to instruct the jury upon a particular point, if they believed from the evidence certain facts, and there was not the slightest evidence from which the jury had a right to believe the existence of any such facts, the court ought not to have given such instructions, since they were calculated to mislead them, and raise a mere speculative question.

2. Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide any question which occurs in the cause; and, whether its decision be correct, or otherwise, its judgments, until reversed, are regarded as binding in every other court. But if it act without authority, its judgments, and orders, are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void; and form no bar to a remedy sought in opposition to them, even prior to a reversal. They constitute no justification; and all persons concerned in executing such judgments, or sentences, are considered, in law, as trespassers.

The decree of the Supreme Court of Ohio by which a conveyance of land is directed to be made, the decree being according to the laws of Ohio, vested in those to whom the deed was ordered to be made, such a legal title to the land to have been conveyed by the deed as would have been vested by a deed of equal date; and the Registry Act of Ohio applies as well to a title under such a decree, as it would do if the party held under a bona fide deed of the same date with the patent of the land, and the decree gives a legal title as ample as a deed.

2. Practice.

3. The course of prudence and duty in judicial proceedings in the United States courts, when cases of difficult distribution as to power and right present themselves, is to yield rather than encroach. The duty is reciprocal, and will no doubt be met in the spirit of moderation and comity. In the conflicts of power and opinion, inseparable from our very peculiar relations, cases may occur in which the maintenance of principles, and the administration of justice, according to its innate and inseparable attributes, may require a different course; and when such cases do occur, our courts must do their duty; but until then, it is administering justice in the spirit of the Constitution, to conform as nearly as possible to the administration of justice in the courts of the several States.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

1. District courts of the United States.

2. Admitting that the Legislature of Ohio can give an occupant claimant a right to the value of his improvements, and authorize him to retain possession of the land he has improved, until he shall have received that value; and assuming that they may annex conditions to the change of possession, which, so far as they are constitutional, must be respected in all courts; still, the Legislature cannot change radically the mode of proceeding prescribed for the courts of the United States, or direct those courts in a trial at common law, to appoint commissioners for the decision of questions which a court of common law must submit to a jury.

The Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley's Heirs. (526) 508

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES—3.

1. This action was instituted in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, according to the forms of proceedings adopted and practiced in the courts of that State. The cause was tried by a special jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. On the trial, the counsel for the defendant moved the court to direct the clerk of the court to take down in writing the testimony of the witnesses examined in the cause, that the same might appear on record, such being the practice of the State courts of Louisiana, and which practice the counsel for the defendant insisted was to prevail in the courts of the United States, according to the Act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824; which provides that the mode of proceeding in civil causes in the courts of the United States established in Louisiana, shall be conformable to the laws directing the practice in the District Court of the State, subject to such alterations as the judges of the courts of the United States should establish by rules. The court refused to make the order, or to permit the testimony to be put down in writing; the judge expressing the opinion that the courts of the United States are not governed by the practice of the courts of the State of Louisiana. The defendant moved for a new trial, and the motion being overruled, and judgment entered for the plaintiff on the verdict, the defendant brought a writ of error to this court. Under the laws of Louisiana, on the trial of a cause before a jury, if either party desires it, the verbal evidence is to be taken down in writing by the clerk, to be sent to the Supreme Court, to serve as a statement of facts in case of appeal, and the written evidence produced on the trial is to be filed with the proceedings. This is done to enable the appellate court to exercise the power of granting a new trial, and of revising the judgment of the inferior court. Held, that the refusal of the judge of the District Court of the United States to permit the evidence to be put in writing could not be assigned for error in this court, the cause having been tried in the court below and a verdict given on the facts by a jury; if the same had been put in writing, and been sent up to this court with the record, this court, proceeding under the Constitution of the United States and of the amendment thereto, which declares, "no fact once tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examinable in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law," is not competent to redress any error by granting a new trial. The proviso in the Act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824, ch. 181, demonstrates that it was not the intention of Congress to give an absolute and imperative force to the State modes of proceeding in civil causes in Louisiana in the courts of the United States; for it authorizes the judge to modify them so as to adapt them to the organization of his own courts, and it further demonstrates that no absolute repeal was intended of the antecedent modes of proceeding authorized Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

in the United States courts under former acts of Congress; for it leaves the judge at liberty to make rules, by which discrepancy between the State laws and the laws of the United States may be avoided.

Parsons v. Bedford et al. (444) 736

2. The act of Congress having made the practice of the State courts the rule for the courts of the United States in Louisiana, the District Court of the United States in that district is bound to follow the practice of the State, unless that court had adopted a rule superseding the practice.

Id. (445) 736

3. It was not the intention of Congress, by the general language of the Act of 1824, to alter the appellate jurisdiction of this court, and to confer on it the power of granting a new trial by a re-examination of the facts tried by a jury; and to enable it, after trial by jury, to do that, in respect to the courts of the United States sitting in Louisiana, which is denied to such courts sitting in all the other States of the Union.

Id. (447) 737

4. No court ought, unless the terms of an act of Congress render it unavoidable, to give a construction to the act which should, however unintentional, involve a violation of the Constitution. The terms of the Act of 1824 may well be satisfied by limiting its operation to modes of practice and proceeding in the courts below, without changing the effect or conclusiveness of the verdict of a jury upon the facts litigated on the trial. The party may bring the facts into review before the appellate court, so far as they bear upon questions of law, by a bill of exceptions. If there be any mistake of the facts, the court below is competent to redress it, by granting a new trial.

COVERTURE—3.

See Femes Covert.

DAMAGES—3.

1. The faithful execution of orders which an agent or correspondent has contracted to execute is of vital importance in commercial transactions, and may often affect the injured party far beyond the actual sum misapplied. A failure in this respect may entirely break up a voyage and defeat the whole enterprise. Speculative damages dependent on possible, successive schemes, ought not to be given in such cases; but positive and direct loss, resulting plainly and immediately from the breach of orders, may be taken into the estimate.

Bell et al. v. Cunningham et al. (85) 612

2. The jury, in an action for damages for breach of orders, may compensate the plaintiff for actual loss, and not give vindictive damages. The profits which would have been obtained on the sale of the article directed to be purchased, may be properly allowed as damages.

Id. (86) 612

3. The libelants, in their original libel in the District Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, prayed that certain bales of cotton might be decreed to them with damages and costs. Canter, who also claimed the cotton, prayed the court for restitution, with damages and costs. The District Court decreed restitution of part of the cotton to the libelants, and dismissed the libel, without any award of damages on either side. Both parties appealed from this decree to the Circuit Court, where the decree of the District Court was reversed, and restitution of all the cotton was decreed to Canter, with costs; without any award of damages, or any express reservation of that question in the decree. From this decree the libelants in the District Court appealed to this court; no appeal was entered by Canter. Held, that the question of a claim of damages by Canter is not open before this court. The decree of restitution, without any allowance of damages, was a virtual denial of them, and a final decree upon Canter's claim of damages. It was his duty, at that time, to have filed a cross appeal, if he meant to rely on a claim to damages; and not having done so, it was a submission to the decree of restitution and costs only. This is not a proper case for the award of damages. The proceedings of the libelants were in the ordinary course to vindicate a supposed legal title. There is no pretense to say that the suit was instituted without probable cause, or was conducted in a malicious or oppressive manner. The libelants had a right to submit their title to the decision of a judicial tribunal, in any legal mode which promised them an effectual and speedy redress. Where parties litigate in the admiralty, and there was a probable ground for the suit or defense, the court considers the only compensation which the successful party is entitled to, is a compensation in costs and expenses. If the party has suffered any loss beyond these, it is damnum absque injuria.

Canter v. The American and Ocean

Insurance Company, (318) 692

4. The settled practice of this court is, that whenever damages are claimed by the libellant or the claimant in the original proceedings, if a decree of restitution and costs only passes, it is a virtual denial of damages; and the party will be deemed to have waived the claim for damages unless he then interposes an appeal or cross appeal to sustain that claim.

DEBTS-2.

1. It is admitted that the title of an heir by descent in the real estate of his ancestor, and of a devisee of an estate unconditionally devised to him, is upon the death of the party under whom he claims immediately devolved upon him, and he acquires a vested estate. But this, though true in a general sense, still leaves his title encumbered with all the liens, which have been created by the party in his lifetime, or by law at his decease. It is not an unqualified, though it may be a vested interest, and it confers no title, except to what remains after every such lien is discharged.

Wilkinson v. Leland et al., (658) 553

2. By the laws of Rhode Island, as well as of all the New England States, the real estate of intestates stands chargeable with the payment of their debts upon a deficiency of assets.

DEEDS-1.

1. See Feme covert, 1.

2. If a deed has not been proved, acknowledged and recorded, and would therefore be insufficient against subsequent purchasers, without notice, parties who claim under such deed have a right to come into a court of equity, for a discovery, upon the ground of notice; and if notice should be brought home to subsequent purchasers, the complainants have a right to relief, by a decree quieting the title.

Findlay et al. v. Hinde and Wife, (245) 130

3. The privy examination and acknowledgment of a deed, by a feme covert, so as to pass her estate, cannot be legally proved by parol testimony.

Elliott et al. v. Peirsol et al., (338) 169

4. In Virginia and Kentucky, the modes of conveyance by fine and common recovery, have never been in common use; and in these States, the capacity of a feme covert to convey her estate by deed, is the creature of the statute law; and to make her deed effectual, the forms and solemnities prescribed by the statutes must be pursued.

Id. (Ib.) 169

5. By the Virginia statute of 1748, "when any deed has been acknowledged by a feme covert, and no record made of her privy examination, such deed is not binding upon the feme and her heirs." This law was adopted by Kentucky, at her separation from Virginia; and is understood never to have been repealed.

Id. (339) 169

6. The provisions of the laws of Kentucky, relative to the privy examination of a feme covert, in order to make a conveyance of her estate valid.

Id. (Ib.) 169

7. It is the construction of the Act of 1810, that the clerks of the County Court of Kentucky, have authority to take acknowledgments and privy examinations of femes covert, in all cases of deeds made by them and their husbands.

Id. (Ib.) 169

8. What the law requires to be done, and appear of record, can only be done, and made to appear by the record itself, or an exemplification of it. It is perfectly immaterial whether there be an acknowledgment or privy examination in form, or not, if there be no record made of the privy examination; for, by the express provisions of the law, it is not the fact of privy examination only, but the recording of the fact, which makes the deed effectual to pass the estate of a feme covert.

Id. (340) 170

9. A deed from Baron and feme, of lands in the State of Kentucky, executed to a third person, by which the land of the feme was intended to be conveyed for the purpose of a reconveyance to the husband and thus to vest in him the estate of the wife; was indorsed by the clerk of Woodford County Court, "acknowledged by James Elliott, and Sarah G. Elliott, September 11th, 1816," and was certified as follows:—"Attest, J. M'Kenney, Jun., clerk."

"Woodford County, ss. September 11th, 1813.

"This deed from James Elliott, and Sarah G. Elliott, his wife, to Benjamin Elliott, was this day produced before me, and acknowledged by said James and Sarah to be their act and deed, and the same is duly recorded.

"JOHN M'KENNEY, Jun., C. C. C."

Held, that subsequent proceedings of the Court of Woodford County, by which the defects of the certificate of the clerk to state the privy examination of the feme (which, by the laws of Kentucky, is necessary to make a conveyance of the estate of a feme covert legal), were intended to be cured upon evidence that the privy examination was made by the clerk, will not supply the defect or give validity to the deed.

DEMURRER-3.

1. The party who demurs to evidence, seeks thereby to withdraw the consideration of the facts from the jury; and is, therefore, bound to admit not only the truth of the evidence, but every fact which that evidence may legally conduce to prove in favor of the other party. And if upon any view of the facts the jury might have given a verdict against the party demurring, the court is also at liberty to give judgment against him.

Thornton v. The Bank of Washington, (36) 594

2. The defendant in the court below having withdrawn his cause from the jury by a demurrer to evidence, or having submitted to a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the demurrer, cannot hope for a judgment in his favor, if by any fair construction of the evidence the verdict can be sustained.

DEPOSITIONS-1.

1. The authority given by the Act of Congress of 24th September, 1789, chap. 20, to take depositions of witnesses, in the absence of the opposite party, is in derogation of the rules of the common law, and has always been construed strictly; and, therefore, it is necessary to establish, that all the requisites of the law have been complied with, before such testimony is admissible.

Bell v. Morrison et al., (355) 176

2. The certificate of the magistrate taking the deposition, is good evidence of the facts stated therein, so as to entitle the deposition to be read to the jury; if all the necessary facts are there sufficiently disclosed.

Id. (356) 176

3. It should plainly appear, from the certificate of the magistrate, that all the requisites of the statute have been fully complied with; and no presumption will be admitted to supply any defects in the taking the deposition.

DESCENTS-2.

1. The statute of descents of Rhode Island, of 1822, enacts, "that when any person having title to any real estate of inheritance shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend, and pass in equal portions to his or her kindred in the following course." It then provides, "if there be no father, then to the mother, brother and sister of such intestate, and their descendants, or such of them as there be;" and then declares, in the nature of a proviso, that "when the title to any estate of inheritance, as to which the person having such title shall die intestate, came by descent,

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

gift, or devise from the parent or other kindred of the intestate, and such intestate die without children; such estate shall go to the kin next to the intestate, of the blood of the person from whom such estate came or descended, if any there be."

Gardner v. Collins, (58) 347

2. An estate situated in Rhode Island was devised by John Collins to his daughter, Mary Collins, in fee; Mary Collins intermarried with Caleb Gardner, and upon her death, in 1806, the estate descended to her three children, John, George, and Mary C. Gardner. John and George Gardner died intestate and without issue, and Mary C. Gardner, as heir to her brothers, became seized of the whole estate, and died in 1822. Held, that under the provisions of the law of descents of Rhode Island, two-thirds of the estate of Mary C. Gardner descended to Samuel F. Gardner, Eliza Phillips formerly Eliza Gardner, and Mary Clarke, formerly Mary Gardner, children of Caleb Gardner by a former marriage; they being brothers and sisters of the half blood of Mary C. Gardner; it being admitted that the remaining one-third, which Mary C. Gardner took by immediate descent from her mother, belongs to the heirs of the whole blood of John Collins.

Id. (86) 357

3. The phrase "of the blood," in the statute, includes the half blood. This is the natural meaning of the word "blood," standing alone, and unexplained by any context. A half brother or sister is of the blood of the intestate; for each of them has some of the blood of a common parent in his or her veins. A person is with the most strict propriety of language affirmed to be of the blood of another, who has any, however small, a portion of the same blood derived from a common ancestor. In the common law, the word "blood" is used in the same sense. Whenever it is intended to express any qualification, the word whole or half blood is generally used to designate it, or the qualification is implied from the context, or known principles of law.

Id. (87) 357

4. A descent from a parent to a child cannot be construed to mean a descent through, and not from a parent. So a gift or devise from a parent, must be construed to mean a gift or devise by the act of that parent, and not by that of some other ancestor more remote passing through the parent.

Id. (90) 358

5. It is true, that in a sense an estate may be said to come by descent from a remote ancestor to a person upon whom it has devolved, through many intermediate descents. But this, if not loose language, is not that sense which is ordinarily annexed to the terms. When an estate is said to have descended from A to B, the natural and obvious meaning of the words is, that it is an immediate descent from A to B.

Id. (91) 358

6. At the common law, a man might sometimes inherit who was of the whole blood of the intestate, who could not have inherited from the first purchaser. As in the case of a purchase of an estate by a son who dies without issue, and his uncle inherits the same, and dies without issue; the father may inherit the same from the uncle, although he could not inherit from his own son.

Id. (93) 359

7. By the law of descent of Maryland, a person claiming as heir must prove himself heir of the person last seized of the estate; and if an intestate leaves a brother of the whole blood who survived him and died without issue, and without having ever been actually seized of the estate, the estate will descend to the half blood of the person so seized.

Chirac v. Reinacker, (625) 542

8. It is admitted that the title of an heir by descent in the real estate of his ancestor, and of a devisee of an estate unconditionally devised to him, is upon the death of the party under whom he claims immediately devolved upon him, and he acquires a vested estate. But this, though true in a general sense, still leaves his title encumbered with all the liens, which have been created by the party in his lifetime, or by law at his decease. It is not an unqualified, though it may be a vested interest, and it confers no title, except to what remains after every such lien is discharged.

Wilkinson v. Leland et al., (658) 553

9. By the laws of Rhode Island, as well as of all the New England States, the real estate of intestates stands chargeable with the payment of their debts upon a deficiency of assets.

DEVISE—1.

1. The testator devised to his son Joseph Eden certain portions of his estate in New York, among which were the premises sought to be recovered in this suit, to him, his heirs, executors and administrators forever. In like manner he devised to his son Medcef, his heirs and assigns, certain other portions of his property; and adds the following clause: "It is my will and I do order and appoint, that if either of my said sons should depart this life without lawful issue, his share or part shall go to the survivor. And in case of both their deaths without lawful issue, I give all the property aforesaid to my brother John Eden, of Lofters, in Cleveland, in Yorkshire, and my sister Hannah Johnson, of Whitby, in Yorkshire, and their heirs." Medcef Eden died without issue, having devised his estate to his widow, and other devisees named in his will. According to the established law of New York, nothing passed under the ulterior devise over to John Eden and Hannah Johnson; Medcef Eden on the death of his brother Joseph Eden became seized of an estate in fee-simple absolute.

Waring v. Jackson et al., (571) 267

2. Adverse possession taken and held under a sheriff's sale, by virtue of judgments and executions against Joseph Eden, will not, according to the decisions of the courts of New York, prevent the operation of a devise by another in whom the title to the estate was vested by the death of the defendant in the executions.

Id. (Ib.) 267

3. The testator residing and owning real and personal estate in the county of Alexandria, District of Columbia, by his will gave "all his estate, real and personal, to his wife during her life, for the use and purpose of raising and educating his children," each child at the age of twenty-one to be entitled to an equal portion of his estate, real and personal; subject, each, to a deduction of one-third for the maintenance of his wife. He recommends his wife to sell the negroes for a term of years, and directs "an appraisement" only of "his estate" shall be made, that no sale of the furniture shall be made; and then states "that he is indebted to no one, and proposes to continue so," that he is surety for his brother, for which he holds a deed of trust on his property, sufficient, he hopes, to pay the same, and directs that his "estate shall not be sold to pay these debts, until the property so divided shall be sold," when his "estate must be charged with any deficiency, and directs that his executors shall not give security, as his own estate did not require it." This will does not charge the real estate of the testator with his debts.

Archer et al. v. Deneale et al., (588) 274

4. The word "estate" is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace property of every description, and will charge lands with debts, if used with other words which indicate an intention to charge them; but if used alone, without such intent, they will not have such operation.

Id. (589) 274

1. The testator gave all the rest and residue and remainder of his estate, real and personal, comprehending a large real estate in the city of New York, to the Chancellor of the State of New York, and recorder of the city of New York, &c. (naming several other persons by their official description), to have and to hold the same unto them and their respective successors in office to the uses and trusts, subject to the conditions and appointments declared in the will; which were, out of the rents, issues and profits thereof, to erect and build upon the land upon which he resided, which was given by the will, an asylum, or marine hospital, to be called "The Sailor's Snug Harbor," for the purpose of maintaining and supporting aged, decrepit and worn-out sailors, &c. And after giving directions as to the management of the fund by his trustees, and declaring that the institution created by his will should be perpetual, and that those officers and their successors should forever continue the governors thereof, &c., he adds, "it is my will and desire that if it cannot legally be done according to my above intention, by them, without an act of the Legislature, it is my will and desire that they will as soon as possible apply for an act of the Legislature to incorporate them for the purpose above specified; and I do further declare it to be my will and intention that the said rest, residue, &c., of my estate should be at all events applied for the uses and purposes above set forth; and that it is my desire all courts of law and equity will so construe this my said last will as to have the said estate appropriated to the above uses, and that the same should in no case, for want of legal form or otherwise, be so construed as that my relations, or any other persons, should heir, possess or enjoy my property, except in the manner and for the uses herein above specified." Within five years after the death of the testator, the Legislature of the State of New York, on the application of the trustees, also named as executors of the will, passed a law constituting the persons holding the offices designated in the will and their successors a body corporate, by the name of "The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor," and enabling them to execute the trusts declared in the will. This is a valid devise to divest the heir of his legal estate, or at all events to affect the lands in his hands with the trust declared in the will. If, after such a plain and unequivocal declaration of the testator with respect to the disposition of his property, so cautiously guarding against and providing for every supposed difficulty that might arise, any technical objection shall now be interposed to defeat his purpose, it will form an exception to what we find so universally laid down in all our books as a cardinal rule in the construction of wills, that the intention of the testator is to be sought after and carried into effect. If this intention cannot be carried into effect precisely in the mode at first contemplated by him, consistently with the rules of law, he has provided an alternative, which with the aid of the act of the Legislature, must remove every difficulty.

Ingalls v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor. (113) 622

2. In the case of "The Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors" (4 Wheat., 27), the court considered the bequest void for uncertainty as to the devisees, and the property vested in the next of kin, or was disposed of by some other provisions of the will. If the testator in that case had bequeathed the property to the Baptist Association on its becoming thereafter and within a reasonable time incorporated, could there be a doubt but that the subsequent incorporation would have conferred on the association the capacity of taking and managing the fund?

Id. (114) 623
3. C. B., by her last will and testament, devised "all her estate, real and personal, wheresoever and whatsoever in law or equity, in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, unto her executors and to the survivor of them, his heirs and assigns forever," upon certain designated trusts; under the statute of wills of the State of New York (1 N. Y. Revised Laws, 364), all the rights of the testator to real estate, held adversely at the time of the decease of the testator, passed to the devisees by this will.

Id. (127) 627
4. The testator was seized of a very large real and personal estate in the States of Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio and Tennessee. After making, by his will, in addition to her dower, a very liberal provision for his wife for her life, out of part of his real estate, and devising, in case of his having a child or children, the whole of his estate to such child or children with the exception of the provision for his wife and certain other bequests, his will declares: "In case of having no children, I then leave and bequeath all my real estate at the death of my wife to William King, son of brother James King, on condition of his marrying a daughter of William Trigg's, and my niece Rachel his wife, lately Rachael Finlay, in trust for the eldest son or issue of said marriage; and in case such marriage should not take place, I leave and bequeath said estate to any child, giving preference to age, of said William and Rachel Trigg, that will marry a child of my brother James King's or of my sister Elizabeth's, wife to John Mitchell, and to their issue." The testator died without issue. He survived his father, and had brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood, who survived him, and also a sister of the whole blood, Elizabeth, the wife of John Mitchell, who died before him. William and Rachel Trigg never had a daughter, but had four sons. James King, the father of William King, the devisee, had only one daughter, who intermarried with Alexander McCall. Elizabeth, the wife of John Mitchell, had two daughters, both of whom are married, one to William Heiskill, the other to Abraham B. Trigg. BY THE COURT: We have found no case in which a general devise in words, importing a present interest in a will making no other disposition of the property on a condition which may be performed at any time, has been construed, from the mere circumstance that the estate is given on condition, to require that the condition must be performed before the estate can vest. There are many cases in which the contrary principle has been decided. The condition on which the devise to William King depended, is a condition subsequent.

Finlay v. King's Lessee. (377) 712

5. It is certainly well settled that there are no technical appropriate words which always determine whether a devise be on a condition precedent or subsequent. The same words have been determined differently, and the question is always a question of intention. If the language of the particular clause, or of the whole will, shows that the act upon which the estate depends must be performed before the estate can vest, the condition of course is precedent; and unless it is performed, the devisee can take nothing. If, on the contrary, the act does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, it is to be collected from the whole will, the condition is subsequent.

Id. (374) 711

6. It is a general rule that a devise in words of the present time, as, "I give to A my lands in B," imports, if no contrary intent appears, an immediate interest, which vests in the devisee on the death of the testator. It is also a general rule that if an estate be given on a condition, for the performance of which no time is limited, the devisee has his life for performance. The result of these two principles seems to be that a devise to A, on condition that he shall marry B, if uncontrolled by other words, takes effect immediately, and the devisee performs the condition if he marry B at anytime during his life. The condition is subsequent.

Id. (376) 712

7. As the devise in the will to William King was on a condition subsequent, it may be construed so far as respects the time of taking possession, as if it had been unconditional. The condition opposes no obstacle to his immediate possession, if the intent of the testator shall require that construction.

Id. (378) 712

8. The introductory clause in the will states, "I, William King, have thought proper to make and ordain this to be my last will and testament, leaving and bequeathing my worldly estate in the manner following." These words are entitled to considerable influence in a question of doubtful intent, in a case where the whole property is given, and the question arises between the heir and devisee respecting the interest devised. The words of the particular clause also carry the whole estate from the heir, but they fix the death of the testator's wife as the time when the devisee shall be entitled to possession. They are, "in case of having no children, I then leave and bequeath all my real estate, at the death of my wife, to William King, son of brother James King." The whole estate is devised to William King, but the possession of that part of it which is given to the wife or others for life, is postponed until her death.

Id. (379) 713

9. Quære, Did William King take an estate which, in the events that have happened, enures to his own benefit; or is he, in the existing state of things, to be considered a trustee for the heirs of the testator? This question cannot be decided in this cause; it belongs to a court of chancery, and will be determined when the heirs shall bring a bill to enforce the execution of the trust.

DEVISE AND BEQUEST—2.

1. The testatrix directed that the interest of certain funds should be applied "to the proper education" of certain persons her nephews, "so that they may be severally fitted and accomplished in some useful trade;" and gave to each of them "who should live to finish his education or reach the age of twenty-one years of age, one hundred pounds to set him up in his trade." She also gave the whole of her estates of every description, to be equally divided among certain persons, who should be living when the interest applicable to the education of her nephews should cease to be required, they being some of the persons among whom the same was to be divided; and she directed that so long as any one of the three nephews who should live, had not finished his education, or arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the division of the property so devised and given, should be deferred, and no longer.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

The court do not think that in ascertaining the amount applicable to the education of the appellant, one of the learned professions may be taken as the standard, with as much propriety as the trade or art of a mechanic. The distinction between a profession and a trade is well understood; and they are seldom, if ever, confounded with each other in ordinary language. If the testatrix had contemplated what in the common intercourse of society is denominated a profession, she would scarcely have used a term, which is generally received as denoting a mechanical art. But the bequest is not confined to the expense of acquiring the trade, so as to be enabled to exercise it in the common way. The testatrix intended such an education as would fit her relations to hold a distinguished place in that line of life in which she designed them to move. The sum allowed for the object ought to be liberal, such as would accomplish it, if the fund from which it was to be drawn would permit it.

DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

A District Court of the United States, performing the appropriate duty of a District Court, is not sitting as a Circuit Court, because it possesses the powers of a Circuit Court also.

Southwick et al. v. The Postmaster-General, (442) 479

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—1.

1. The Act of the Legislature of Maryland, passed 19th December, 1791, entitled "An Act concerning the Territory of Columbia, and the City of Washington," which, by the sixth section provides for the holding of lands by "foreigners," is an enabling act; and applies to those only who could not take lands without the provisions of that law. It enables a "foreigner" to take in the same manner as if he were a citizen.

Spratt v. Spratt, (349) 173

2. A foreigner who becomes a citizen, is no longer a foreigner, within the view of the act. Thus after-purchased lands, vest in him as a citizen, not by virtue of the act of the Legislature of Maryland, but because of his acquiring the rights of citizenship.

Id. (Ib.) 173

3. Land in the County of Washington, and District of Columbia, purchased by a foreigner, before naturalization, was held by him under the law of Maryland, and might be transmitted to the relations of the purchasers, who were foreigners; and the capacity so to transmit those lands, is given absolutely by this act, and is not affected by his becoming a citizen; but passes to his heirs and relations, precisely as if he had remained a foreigner.

Id. (Ib.) 173

4. The Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction of appeals from the Orphans' Court through the Circuit Court for the County of Washington, by virtue of the Act of Congress of February 13, 1801; and by the act of Congress subsequently passed, the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, must exceed the value of $1,000 in order to entitle the party to an appeal.

EJECTMENT—2.

Where A was the real landlord of the premises in controversy in an ejectment, and employed counsel to defend the suit, but was not a party defendant on the record, the record of the recovery Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

in the ejectment, when offered in evidence in an action of trespass for mesne profits against B, is not conclusive evidence of title in the plaintiffs; but it is prima facie evidence thereof, and is evidence of the plaintiffs' possession; but B may controvert the title of the plaintiffs. As to third persons, strangers to the suit, the record is evidence to show possession of the property in the plaintiffs.

Chirac v. Reinecker, (622) 541

EJECTMENT—3.

1. When a tenant disclaims to hold under his lease, he becomes a trespasser, and his possession is adverse, and as open to the action of his landlord as possession acquired originally by wrong. The act is conclusive on the tenant. He cannot revoke his disclaimer and adverse claim, so as to protect himself during the unexpired time of the lease. He is a trespasser on him who has the legal title. The relation of landlord and tenant is dissolved, and each party is to stand upon his right.

Willison v. Watkins, (49) 599

2. If the tenant disclaims the tenure, claims the fee adversely in right of a third person or in his own right, or attorns to another, his possession then becomes a tortious one by the forfeiture of his right, and the landlord's right of entry is complete, and he may sue at any time within the period of limitation; but he must lay his devise of a day subsequent to the termination of the tenancy, for before that he had no right of entry. By bringing his ejectment he disclaims the tenancy and goes for the forfeiture. It shall not be permitted to the landlord to thus admit that there is no tenure subsisting between him and the tenant which can protect his possession from this adversary suit, and at the same time recover on the ground of there being a tenure so strong as that he cannot set up his adversary possession.

Id. (Ib.) 599

3. A mortgagee, or direct purchaser from the tenant, or one who buys his right at a sheriff's sale, assumes his relation to the landlord, with all its legal consequences, and is as much estopped from denying the tenancy.

Id. (50) 599

4. It is an undoubted principle of law, fully recognized in this court, that a tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord, either by setting up a title in himself or a third person, during the existence of the lease or tenancy. The principle of estoppel applies to the relation between them, and operates with full force to prevent the tenant from violating that contract by which he claimed and held the possession. He cannot change the character of the tenure by his own act merely, so as to enable himself to hold against his landlord, who responds under the security of the tenancy, believing the possession of the tenant to be his own, held under his title, and ready to be surrendered by its termination by the lapse of time or demand of possession.

Id. (47) 598

5. The same principle applies to a mortgagee and mortgagee, trustee and cestui que trust and generally, to all cases where one man obtains possession of real estate belonging to another by a recognition of his title.

Id. (48) 598

EQUITY—1.

1. It is a principle of equity that when an instrument is drawn and executed which professes, or is intended, to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into; but which, by mistake of the draftsman either in fact or in law, does not fulfill, or which violates the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement; equity will correct the mistake, so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement.

Hunt v. Rousmaniere's Adm., (13) 33

2. The execution of instruments, fairly and legally entered into, is one of the peculiar branches of equity jurisdiction; and a court of equity will compel a delinquent party to perform his agreement according to the terms of it, and to the manifest intention of the parties.

Id. (Ib.) 33

3. So, if the mistake exist, not in the instrument, which is intended to give effect to the agreement, but in the agreement itself, and is clearly proved to have been the result of ignorance of some material fact, a court of equity will, in general, grant relief, according to the nature of the particular case in which it is sought.

Hunt v. Rousmaniere's Adm., (13) 33

4. If an agreement was not founded on a mistake of any material fact, and if it was executed in strict conformity with itself, it would be unprecedented for a court of equity to decree another security to be given different from that which had been agreed upon; or to treat the case as if such other security had, in fact, been agreed upon and executed.

Id., (14) 33

5. Courts of Equity may compel parties to execute their agreements, but they have no power to make agreements for them. The death of one of the parties, and the consequent inefficiency of a security selected and intended to be valid and complete, but which was not so, will not give the right of interference.

Id., (1b.) 33

6. A mistake arising from ignorance of law is not a ground for reforming a deed founded on such mistake, except in some few cases, and those of peculiar characters.

Id., (15) 33

7. If the obligee of a joint bond, by two or more, agree with one obligor to release him, and do so, and all the obligors are thereby discharged at law, equity will not afford relief against the legal consequences; although the release was given under a manifest misapprehension of the legal effect of it in relation to the other obligors.

Id., (16) 33

8. It seems that there may be cases in which a court of equity will relieve against a plain mistake arising from ignorance of law. But where parties upon deliberation and advice, reject one species of security, and agree to select another, under a misapprehension of the law as to the nature of the security thus selected, a court of equity will not, on the ground of misapprehension, and the insufficiency of the security, in consequence of a subsequent event not foreseen, direct a security of a different character to be given, or decree that to be done which the parties suppose would have been effected by the instrument which was finally agreed upon. The court would be much less disposed to interfere in such a case in favor of a particular creditor against the general creditors of an insolvent estate.

Id., (17) 35

9. Parol evidence, 1.

10. Where the vendee of real estate had purchased it subject to the dower of the widow—of which dower he might have been informed if he had used proper diligence—a court of equity will not interfere to release the vendee, but will leave him to such legal remedy as he may be entitled to, in case his title should, at any future time, be disturbed.

Greenleaf v. Queen et al., (147) 87

11. Chancery Practice, 1, 2, 3.

12. A court of equity ought not to decree specific performance of a contract to the letter, where, from change of circumstances, mistake or misapprehension, it would be unconscientious so to do. The court may so modify the agreement as to do justice, as far as the circumstances will permit, and refuse specific execution unless the party seeking it will comply with such modifications as justice requires.

The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Lynn, (382) 187

13. If a bill charges a defendant with notice of a particular fact, an answer must be given without special interrogatory to the matter. But, a defendant is not bound to answer an interrogatory not warranted by some matter contained in a former part of the bill.

Id., (383) 188

14. When a judgment debtor comes into a court asking protection on the ground that he has satisfied the judgment, the door is fully open for the court to modify or grant the prayer, upon such conditions as justice demands.

Id., (384) 188

15. In an appeal, under the testamentary law of Maryland, the court being satisfied by an examination of the evidence contained in the record of the proceedings of the Orphans' Court of the County of Washington, relative to a claim made upon the estate of the testator by the executor, that the said evidence was too loose and indefinite to sanction the claim, disallowed the same; and reversed the decree of the Orphans' Court which allowed the claim.

Nicholls et al. v. Hodges' Ex., (566) 264

EQUITY—2.

It is well settled, both in the court of Kentucky and in this court, that a possession which will bar an ejectment, is also a bar in equity.

ERROR—2.

The court refused to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court of the County of Washington, although an error had been committed in proceeding under the mandate from this court; as no benefit would result to the appellant from a reversal.

Campbell's Executors v. Pratt, (354) 449

ERROR—3.

Generally speaking, matters on practice in the inferior courts do not constitute subjects upon which errors can be assigned in the appellate court.

Parsons v. Bedford et al., (445) 736

ESCAPE—4.

After judgment obtained in the Circuit Court of the United States against the drawer of a note, a capias ad satisfaciendum was issued against him by the holder, and he was put in prison. Two justices of the peace ordered his discharge, claiming to proceed according to the law of Kentucky in the case of insolvent debtors; and the jailer permitted him to leave the prison. The jailer made himself and his securities liable for an escape, by permitting the prisoner to leave the prison.

EVIDENCE—1.

1. When one party to an agreement, signed by the other contracting party, had delivered to such party a copy of an agreement in his own handwriting, but not signed by him, and from the nature of the instrument it was to be fairly presumed the original was in his custody, notice to produce the original paper in order to give the copy in evidence is not necessary. Such a copy, when offered to charge the party by whom the same was made, and who, by the tenor of the agreement, was to perform certain acts therein stated, may be considered not as a copy but as an original, in relation to the obligations of the party giving the copy, and be so given in evidence.

Carroll v. Peake, (22) 36

2. Where letters, a part of the evidence in the court below, have become lost or mislaid, everything is to be presumed to have been contained in them, to support the opinion of the court, in relation to their contents; and the party who denies that the letters authorized the decision of the court upon them, must show, by evidence, their contents.

Id., (1b.) 36

3. If in any case in which testimony was offered by a plaintiff, the court ought to instruct the jury that he had no right to recover, such instruction certainly ought not to be granted, if any possible construction of the testimony would support the action.

The Bank of Washington v. Triplett & Neale, (31) 40

4. The cross examination of a witness by the opposite party is considered as a waiver of exceptions to the regularity of his deposition.

5. By the rules of this court, "in all cases of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, no objection shall be allowed to be taken to the admissibility of any deposition, deed, grant, or other exhibit, found in the record, as evidence; unless objection was taken thereto in the court below; but the same shall otherwise be deemed to have been taken by consent."

gave, at considerable intervals, certificates of the total amount of hides received from the last preceding settlement up to the periods when the certificates bore date, such certificates are equally binding, as certificates detailing the separate transactions of each day; and may be read in evidence to charge the parties, whose agent the person giving the certificates was.

Barry v. Foyles, (316) 159

7. Where the suit is brought upon a partnership transaction against one of the partners, and the declaration stated a contract with the partner who is sued, and gave no notice that it was made by him with another person, evidence of a joint assumpsit may be given to support such a declaration; and the want of notice has never been considered as justifying an exception to such evidence at the trial.

Id. (317) 160

8. Depositions, how taken under the provisions of the Act of Congress of 24th September.

Bell v. Morrison, (355) 176

9. The authority given by the Act of Congress of 24 September, 1789, ch. 20, to take depositions of witnesses in the absence of the opposite party, is in derogation of the rules of the common law, and has always been construed strictly; and, therefore, it is necessary to establish that all the requisites of the law have been complied with before such testimony is admissible.

Id. (1*b.*) 176

10. The certificate of the magistrate taking the deposition is good evidence of the facts stated therein, so as to entitle the deposition to be read to the jury, if all the necessary facts are there sufficiently disclosed.

Id. (356) 176

11. It should plainly appear from the certificate of the magistrate that all the requisites of the statute have been fully complied with, and no presumption will be admitted to supply any defects in the taking the deposition.

Id. (1*b.*) 176

12. A letter from a deceased member of a family stating the pedigree of the family, and sworn by the wife to have been written by her husband, who also swore in her deposition that the facts stated in the letter had been frequently mentioned by her husband in his lifetime, is legal evidence; as is also the deposition of the witness, in a question of pedigree.

Elliott v. Peirsol, (337) 169

13. The rule of evidence that in questions of pedigree, the declarations of aged and deceased members of the family may be proved and given in evidence, has not been controverted.

Id. (1*b.*) 169

14. In a case where a controversy had arisen, or was expected to arise, between parties, concerning the validity of a deed, against which one of the parties claimed, but no controversy was then expected to arise about the heirship; a letter written about the time, stating the pedigree of the claimants, was not considered as excluded by the rule of law which declares that declarations relating to pedigree made post litem motam, cannot be given in evidence.

Id. (1*b.*) 169

15. Where the defendant has reserved a right to move the court to exclude any part of the plaintiff's evidence which he might choose to designate as incompetent, and it did not appear from the bill of exceptions that he designated any particular piece or part of the evidence as objectionable, and moved the court to exclude the whole, or to instruct the jury that it was insufficient to prove title in the lessors of the plaintiff; this could not be done on the ground of incompetency unless the whole was incompetent. The court is not bound to do more than respond to the motion in the terms in which it is made. Courts of justice are not obliged to modify the propositions submitted by counsel, so as to make them fit the case. If they do not fit, that is enough to authorize their rejection.

Id. (338) 169

16. A joint and several bond, where it was not understood to be offered as general evidence as to all the parties to it, but only as to one of the obligors, and was connected with a title derived from that obligor; was properly permitted to go to the jury, upon proof of the execution of the bond by that obligor alone; as, under the circumstances, it was prima facie evidence of his execution of the instrument.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

17. Under the law of the State of Kentucky and the decisions of their courts, a will with two witnesses is sufficient to pass real estate; and the copy of such a will, duly proved and recorded in another State, is good evidence of the execution of the will.

Davis v. Mason, (508) 241

18. It is a settled rule in Kentucky that although more than one witness is required to subscribe a will disposing of lands, the evidence of one may be sufficient to prove it.

Id. (509) 241

19. The rule of law is that the best evidence must be given of which the nature of the thing is capable; that is, that no evidence shall be received which presupposes greater evidence behind in the party's possession or power. The withholding of that better evidence raises a presumption that, if produced, it might not operate in favor of the party who is called upon for it. For this reason a party who is in possession of an original paper, is not permitted to give a copy in evidence or to prove its contents.

Taylor v. Riggs, (596) 277

20. The affidavit of a party to the cause, of the loss or destruction of an original paper, offered in order to introduce secondary evidence of the contents of the paper, is proper. If such affidavit could not be received of the loss of a written contract, the contents of which are well known to others, or a copy of which can be proved, a party might be completely deprived of his rights, at least in a court of law.

Id. (1*b.*) 277

21. It is a sound general rule that a party cannot be a witness in his own cause; but many collateral questions arise in the progress of a cause, to which the rule does not apply. Questions which do not involve the matter in controversy, but matter which is auxiliary to the trial, and which facilitates the preparation for it, often depends on the oath of the party. An affidavit of the materiality of a witness for the purpose of obtaining a continuance, or a commission to take depositions, or an affidavit of his inability to attend, is usually made by the party, and received without objection. On incidental questions, which do not affect the issue to be tried by the jury, the affidavit of the party is received.

Id. (1*b.*) 277

22. The testimony which establishes the loss of a paper is addressed to the court, and does not relate to the contents of the paper. It is a fact which may be important as letting the party in to prove the justice of the cause, but does not itself prove anything in the cause.

Id. (597) 277

23. In an action upon a written contract, said to have been lost or destroyed, and not for deceit and imposition, the plaintiff's right to recover is measured principally by the contract; and the secondary evidence must prove it as laid in the declaration. The conversation which preceded the agreement forms no part of it, nor are the propositions or representations which were made at the time, but not introduced into the written contract, to be taken into view in construing the instrument itself. Had the written paper stated to be lost or mislaid been produced, neither party could have been permitted to show the party's inducements to make it, or to substitute his understanding for the agreement itself. If he was drawn into it by misrepresentation, that circumstance might furnish him with a different action, but cannot affect this.

Id. (598) 278

24. When a written contract is to be proved, not by itself but by parol testimony, no vague uncertain recollection concerning its stipulations ought to supply the place of the written instrument itself. The substance of the agreement ought to be proved satisfactorily; and if that cannot be done, the party is in the condition of every other suitor in court who makes a claim which he cannot support.

Id. (600) 279

25. When parties reduce their contract to writing, the obligations and rights of each are described by the instrument itself. The safety which is expected from them would be much impaired if they could be established upon uncertain and vague impressions made by a conversation antecedent to the reduction of the agreement.

Id. (1*b.*) 279

EVIDENCE—2.

1. It is undoubtedly true, that questions respecting the admissibility of evidence, are entirely dis-ting from those which refer to its sufficiency or effect. They arise in different stages of the trial; and cannot, with strict propriety, be propounded at the same time.

The Columbian Insurance Company v. Lawrence. (44) 343

2. Presumptions from evidence of the existence of particular facts, are in many cases, if not in all, mixed questions of law and fact. If the evidence be irrelevant to the fact insisted upon, or be such as cannot fairly warrant a jury in presuming it, the court is so far from being bound to instruct them that they are at liberty to presume it, that they would err in giving such an instruction.

The Bank of the United States v. Coreoran, (133) 372

3. A court cannot be required to give an instruction to the jury as to the relation, right and credibility of the testimony adduced by the parties in a cause.

Van Ness v. Pacard, (149) 378

4. In an action originally commenced against A and B as partners, upon an alleged engagement by the firm, and where A, who was not found or served with process, was offered as a witness in favor of B, having been released by B, the court said: "It is to be premised that the only ground upon which the objection can be rested is the supposed interest of the witness in the event of the cause: since the suit having regularly abated as to him by the return that he was "no inhabitant," he was no more a party to it than he would have been had his name been altogether omitted in the declaration. As to the objection upon the score of interest, it is sufficient to remark, that it was manifestly hostile to the party in whose favor he testified, and who offered it in evidence; since the plaintiffs' recovery against the defendant, and satisfaction from him, would be a bar to their action against the witness; and the release of A protected him against any action which A might bring against him for contribution or otherwise."

Le Roy et al. v. Johnson, (194) 395

5. Undoubtedly, the presumption is in favor of the validity of every grant issued in the forms prescribed by law; and it is incumbent on him who controverts it to support his objections. The whole burthen of proof lies on him. But if his objections depend on facts, those facts must be submitted to a jury. If opposing testimony be produced, that testimony, also, must be laid before the jury; and the court may declare the law upon the fact, but cannot declare it on the testimony.

Patterson's Lessee v. Jenks, (227) 406

6. Whatever an agent does or says in reference to the business in which he is at the time employed, and within the scope of his authority, is done or said by the principal; and may be proved, as well in a criminal as a civil case, in like manner as if the evidence applied personally to the principal.

American Fur Company v. The United States, (364) 452

7. Where two or more persons are associated together for the same illegal purpose, any act or declaration of one of the parties in reference to the common object, and forming a part of the res gesta, may be given in evidence against the other.

Id. (365) 453

8. After the plaintiffs had proved, by a surveyor, that most of the lines and streets in "Howard's late addition to Baltimore town" had been run by him as the same were marked in a particular plot, upon which was the lot of ground for which the ejectment was brought, they gave the plot so authenticated in evidence. This was contained in a volume in which were also other plots. The defendant then offered in evidence another plot, in the same volume, but gave no evidence to authenticate it, claiming to use the same in evidence, as it was authenticated in the same volume in which was that exhibited by the plaintiffs. It was held, that the whole volume was not in evidence; and if the defendant meant to use any plot in the same, it was his duty to establish it by competent proof of its particular authenticity.

Chirac et al. v. Reinecker, (619) 540

9. Evidence to establish heirship and pedigree, had been obtained under a commission issued for that purpose to France, in an action of ejectment, in which the plaintiffs had recovered the lots of ground for which this suit was instituted. In the course of that trial, a bill of exception was tendered by the plaintiffs and sealed by the court, in which the evidence contained in the commission was inserted. The commission and the testimony obtained under it were afterwards lost. In an action for mesne profits, brought by the plaintiffs in the ejectment, against the landlord of the defendant in the suit, who had employed counsel to oppose the claims of the plaintiffs, but who was not a party to the suit on record; it was held, that the testimony, as copied into the bill of exceptions, was legal and competent evidence of pedigree.

Id. (620) 540

10. It is well known that in cases of pedigree, the rules of law have relaxed in respect to evidence to an extent far beyond what has been applied to other cases. This relaxation is founded on principles of public convenience and necessity.

Id. (621) 540

11. Where A was the real landlord of the premises in controversy in an ejectment, and employed counsel to defend the suit, but was not a party defendant on the record, the record of the recovery in the ejectment, when offered in evidence in an action of trespass for mesne profits against B, is not conclusive evidence of title in the plaintiffs; but is prima facie evidence thereof, and is evidence of the plaintiffs' possession; but B may controvert the title of the plaintiffs. As to third persons, strangers to the suit, the record is evidence to show possession of the property in the plaintiffs.

Id. (622) 541

EVIDENCE—3.

1. See Commission, 1, 2, 3, 4.

2. A witness, the clerk of the plaintiff, examined under a commission, stated the payment of a sum of money to have been made by him to the defendant, and that the defendant, at his request, made an entry in the plaintiff's rough cash book, writing his name at full length, and stating the sum paid to him, not so much for the sake of the receipt, as in order for him, the witness, to become acquainted with his signature and the way of spelling his name. It is not necessary to produce the book in which the entry was made, and parol evidence of the payment of the money is legal. It cannot be laid down as a universal rule, that where written evidence of a fact exists, all parol evidence of the same fact is excluded.

Keene v. Meade, (7) 383

3. An account stated at the Treasury Department which does not arise in the ordinary mode of doing business in that department, can derive no additional validity from being certified under the act of Congress. A treasury statement can only be regarded as establishing items for moneys disbursed through the ordinary channels of the department, where the transactions are shown by its books. In these cases the officers may well certify, for they must have official knowledge of the facts stated.

The United States v. Buford, (29) 591

4. But when moneys come into the hands of an individual, not through the officers of the treasury, or in the regular course of official duty, the books of the treasury do not exhibit the facts, nor can they be known to the officers of the department. In such a case the claim of the United States for money thus in the hands of a third person must be established, not by a treasury statement, but by the evidence on which that statement was made.

Id. (1b.) 591

5. On a trial in ejectment, the plaintiffs offered in evidence a number of entries of recent date, made by the defendants, within the bounds of the tract of land in dispute, designated as "Young's four thousand acres;" and attempted to prove by a witness that Young, when he made the entries, had heard of the plaintiffs' claim to the land. The defendants then offered to introduce as evidence, official copies of entries made by other and third persons since the date of the plaintiffs' grant, for the purpose of proving a general opinion, that the lands contained in the plaintiff's survey, made under the order of the court, after the commencement of the suit, were vacant at the date of such entries; and to disprove notice to him of the identity of plaintiff's claim when he made the entries under which he claimed. The evidence was unquestionably irrelevant.

EVIDENCE—4.

1. The plaintiff claimed under a marriage settlement purporting to be executed the 13th of January, 1758, by an indenture of release between Mary Philipse, of the first part, Roger Morris, of the second part, and Johanna Philipse and Beverly Robinson, of the third part. Whereby, in consideration of a marriage intended to be solemnized between Roger Morris and Mary Philipse, &c., R. M. and M. P. granted, &c., to J. P. and B. R. "in their actual possession now being, by virtue of a bargain and sale to them thereof made for one whole year, by indenture bearing date the day next before the date of these presents, and by force of the statute for transferring uses into possession, and to their heirs, all those," &c., upon certain trusts therein mentioned. This indenture, signed and sealed by the parties, and attested by the subscribing witnesses to the sealing and delivery thereof, with a certificate of William Livingston, one of the witnesses, and the execution thereof before a judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, dated the 5th of April, 1757, and of the recording thereof in the Secretary's office of New York, was offered in evidence by the plaintiff, and objected to, on the ground that the certificate of the execution was not legal and competent evidence, and did not entitle the plaintiff to read the deed without proof of its execution. A witness was sworn, who proved the handwriting of William Livingston, and of the other subscribing witness, both of whom were dead. The certificate of the judge of the Supreme Court of New York stated that William Livingston had sworn before him that he saw the parties to the deed "sign and seal the indenture, and deliver it as their and each of their voluntary acts and deeds," &c. BY THE COURT: According to the laws of New York, there was sufficient prima facie evidence of the due execution of the indenture; not merely of the signing and sealing, but of the delivery, to justify the court in admitting the deed to be read to the jury; and that in the absence of all controlling evidence, the jury would have been bound to find that the deed was duly executed.

Carver v. Astor, (1) 761

2. The plaintiff, in the ejectment, derived title under the deed of marriage settlement of the 15th of January, 1758, executed by Mary Philipse, who afterwards intermarried with Roger Morris, and by Roger Morris and certain trustees named in the same. The premises, before the execution of the deed of marriage settlement, were the property of Mary Philipse, in fee-simple. The defendant claimed title to the same premises under a sale made thereof, as the property of Roger Morris and wife, by certain commissioners acting under the authority of an Act of the Legislature of New York passed the 22d of October, 1779, by which the premises were directed to be sold as the property of Roger Morris and wife, as forfeited; Roger Morris and wife having been declared to be convicted and attainted of adhering to the enemies of the United States. Not only is the recital of the lease in the deed of marriage settlement evidence between the original parties to the same of the existence of the lease, but between the parties to this case the recital is conclusive evidence of the same, and supercedes the necessity of introducing any other evidence to establish it.

Id., (Ib.) 761

3. The recital of a lease in a deed of release is conclusive evidence upon all persons claiming under the parties in privity of estate. Independently of authority, the court would have arrived at the same conclusion upon principle.

4. Law of estoppels.

5. Leases, like other deeds and grants, may be presumed from long possession, which cannot otherwise be explained; and under such circumstances, a recital in an old deed of the fact of such a lease having been executed, is certainly presumptive proof, or stronger, in favor of such possession under title, than the naked presumption arising from a mere unexplained possession.

6. The Legislature incorporated a company, and declared that the Act of Incorporation should be considered a public act. Held: the provision in the act that it should be considered a public act, must be regarded in courts; and its enactments noticed, without being specially pleaded, as would be necessary if the act were private.

7. As the records of the land-office are of great importance to the country, and are kept under the official sanction of the government, their contents must always be considered, and they are always received in courts of justice as evidence of the facts stated.

8. After an assessor of taxes has made the returns of his assessments according to the law under which he acted, and the books for the collection of the taxes have been made up according to the returns, and delivered to a collector, it is not necessary to prove the appointment of the assessor. The highest evidence of his appointment is the sanction given to the returns of the assessor.

EXECUTION—1.

Under the law of Virginia which directs the sheriff holding an execution against the goods and effects of defendants to take fortheoming bonds for the property levied upon by the execution, and authorizes execution to issue for the amount of the debt due upon the original execution after ten days' notice to the obligors in the bond of the motion for execution, the property levied on not having been redelivered according to the condition of the bond; if the notice given to the obligees (of the plaintiff's intention to proceed) is sufficiently explicit to render mistake impossible, it will be sustained, although the whole of the defendants in the original execution may not be named in the notice. Nice and technical objections to the notice, where every purpose of substantial justice is effected, ought not to be favored.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—1.

1. The Orphans' Court, by the testamentary laws of Maryland, has a general power to administer justice in all matters relative to the affairs of deceased persons according to law. The commission to be allowed to an executor or administrator is submitted to the discretion of the court, and is to be not under five per cent., nor exceeding ten per cent., on the amount of the inventory.

Nicholls et al. v. Hodges' Ex., (565) 264

2. If the executor has a claim on the estate of the deceased, it shall stand on an equal footing with other claims of the same nature.

Id., (Ib.) 264

3. On a plenary proceeding, if either party shall require it, the court will direct an issue or issues to be made up and sent to a court of law to be tried; and any person conceiving himself aggrieved by any judgment, decree, decision or order, may appeal to the Court of Chancery or to a court of law; and in Maryland, the decision of the court to which the appeal is made is final.

Id., (Ib.) 264

4. The court being satisfied by an examination of the evidence contained in the record of the proceedings of the Orphans' Court of the County of Washington, relative to a claim made upon the estate of the testator by the executor, that the said evidence was too loose and indefinite to sanction the claim, disallowed the same; and reversed the decree of the Orphans' Court which allowed the claim.

Id., (566) 264

5. The commission to be allowed to the executor or administrator is submitted by law to the discretion of the court, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, and it was obviously the intention of the Legislature that the decision of the Orphans' Court should be final and conclusive.

FEME COVERT—1.

1. Feme sole trader.

2. By the law of Maryland, a married woman cannot dispose of real property without the consent of her husband; nor can she execute a good and valid deed to pass real estate, unless he shall join in it. The separate examination and other solemnities required by law are indispensable, and must not be omitted. A deed, therefore, executed by a married woman, of real property, acquired by her while a feme sole trader, while she was abandoned by her husband, is void.

Rhea et al. v. Rhenner, (109) 73

3. The privy examination and acknowledgment of a deed, by a feme covert, so as to pass her estate, cannot be legally proved by parol testimony.

Elliott et al. v. Peirsol et al., (335) 169

4. In Virginia and Kentucky, the modes of conveyance by fine and common recovery have never been in common use; and in these States, the capacity of a feme covert to convey her estate by deed, is the creature of the statute law; and to make her deed effectual, the forms and solemnities prescribed by the statutes must be pursued.

Id. (1b.) 169

5. By the Virginia statute of 1748, "when any deed has been acknowledged by a feme covert, and no record made of her privy examination, such deed is not binding upon the feme and her heirs." This law was adopted by Kentucky at her separation from Virginia, and is understood never to have been repealed.

Id. (339) 169

6. The provisions of the laws of Kentucky, relative to the privy examination of a feme covert, in order to make a conveyance of her estate valid.

Id. (1b.) 169

7. It is the construction of the Act of 1810 that the clerks of the County Court of Kentucky have authority to take acknowledgments and privy examinations of femes covert, in all cases of deeds made by them and their husbands.

Id. (1b.) 169

8. What the law requires to be done, and appear of record, can only be done and made to appear by the record itself, or an exemplification of it. It is perfectly immaterial whether there be an acknowledgment or privy examination in form, or not, if there be no record made of the privy examination; for, by the express provisions of the law, it is not the fact of privy examination only, but the recording of the fact, which makes the deed effectual to pass the estate of a feme covert.

Id. (340) 170

9. A deed from Baron and feme of lands in the State of Kentucky, executed to a third person, by which the land of the feme was intended to be conveyed for the purpose of a reconveyance to the husband, and thus to vest in him the estate of the wife, was indorsed by the clerk of Woodford County Court, "acknowledged by James Elliott, and Sarah G. Elliott, September, 11th, 1816," and was certified as follows:—"Attest, J. M'Kenney, Jun., Clerk."

"Woodford County, ss.

SEPTEMBER 11th, 1813.

"This deed from James Elliott, and Sarah G. Elliott his wife, to Benjamin Elliott, was this day produced before me, and acknowledged by said James and Sarah to be their act and deed, and the same is duly recorded. JOHN M'KENNEY, JUN., C. C. C."

Held, that subsequent proceedings of the Court of Woodford County, by which the defects of the certificate of the clerk to state the privy examination of the feme (which, by the laws of Kentucky, is necessary to make a conveyance of the estate of a feme covert legal) were intended to be cured upon evidence that the privy examination was made by the clerk, will not supply the defect, or give validity to the deed.

Id. (1b.) 170

FEMES COVERT—3.

The incapacities of femes covert provided by the common law, apply to their civil right, and for their protection and interest. But they do not reach their political rights, nor prevent their acquiring or losing a national character. These political rights do not stand upon the mere doctrines of municipal law, applicable to ordinary transactions, but stand upon the more general principles of the law of nations.

Shanks et al. v. Dupont, (248) 669

FEME SOLE TRADERS—1.

The law seems to be settled that when the wife is left by the husband, without maintenance and support, has traded as a feme sole, and has obtained credit as such, she ought to be liable for her debts; and the law is the same, whether the husband is banished for his crimes or has voluntarily abandoned the wife.

FLORIDA—1.

1. The treaty with Spain, by which Florida was ceded to the United States, is the law of the land, and admits the inhabitants of Florida to the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States. They do not, however, participate in political power; they do not share in the government until Florida shall become a State. In the meantime Florida continues to be a territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which empowers "Congress to make all useful rules and regulations, respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States."

The American Insurance Company v. 356 Bales of Cotton, (542) 255

2. The powers of the Territorial Legislature of Florida extend to all rightful objects of legislation; subject to the restriction that their laws shall not be "inconsistent with the laws and Constitution of the United States."

Id. (543) 255

3. All the laws which were in force in Florida while a province of Spain, those excepted which were political in their character, which concerned the relations between the people and their sovereign, remained in force until altered by the government of the United States. Congress recognizes this principle by using the words "laws of the territory now in force therein." No laws could then, have been in force but those enacted by the Spanish government. If among them there existed a law on the subject of salvage—and it is scarcely possible there should not have been such a law—jurisdiction over it was conferred by the act of Congress relative to the Territory of Florida on the Superior Court; but that jurisdiction was not exclusive. A territorial act, conferring jurisdiction over the same cases as an inferior court, would not have been inconsistent with the seventh section of the act vesting the whole judicial power of the territory in two superior courts, and in such inferior courts, and justices of the peace as the legislative council of the territory may from time to time establish."

Id. (544) 256

4. The judges of the superior courts of Florida hold their offices for four years. These courts, then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial powers conferred by the Constitution on the general government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty, which exists in the government, or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make laws regulating the territories belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the third article of the Constitution, but is conferred by Congress in the exercise of its powers over the territories of the United States.

Id. (546) 256

5. Although admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the States in those courts only which are established in pursuance of the third article of the Constitution, the same limitation does not extend to the territories. In legislating for them, Congress exercises the combined powers of the general and State governments.

FLORIDA TREATY—1.

1. The object of the treaty with Spain which ceded Florida to the United States, dated 22d May, 1819, was to invest the commissioners with full power and authority to receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of asserted claims upon Spain for damages and injuries. Their decision, within the scope of this authority, is conclusive and final, and is not re-examinable. The parties must abide by it as the decree of a competent tribunal of exclusive jurisdiction. A rejected claim cannot be brought again under review in any judicial tribunal. But it does not naturally follow that this authority extends to adjust all conflicting rights of different citizens to the fund so awarded. The commissioners are to look to the original claim for damages and injuries against Spain itself; and it is wholly immaterial who is the legal or equitable owner of the claim, provided he is an American citizen.

Comegys et al. v. Vasse, (212) 117
2. After the validity and amount of the claim has been ascertained by the award of the commissioners, the rights of the claimant to the fund, which has passed into his hands and those of others, are left to the ordinary course of judicial proceedings in the established courts of justice.

Id. (17.) 117
3. The treaty with Spain recognized an existing right in the aggrieved parties to compensation; and did not, in the most remote degree, turn upon the notion of donation or gratuity. It was demanded by our government as matter of right, and as such was granted by Spain.

FRAUD—1.

1. Without undertaking to suggest whether in any case the want of possession of the thing sold constitutes, per se, badge of fraud, or is only, prima facie, a presumption of fraud; it is sufficient to say that in case even of an absolute sale of personal property, the want of such possession is not presumption of fraud, if possession cannot, from the circumstances of the property, be within the power of the parties.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (449) 216
2. In cases where the sale is not absolute, but conditional, the want of possession, if consistent with the stipulations of the parties, and a fortiori, if flowing directly from them, has never been held to be, per se, a badge of fraud.

Id. (17.) 216

Patterson's Lessee v. Jenks, (216) 402

2. If the State of Georgia have construed their treaty with the Cherokee Indians, by any subsequent acts manifesting an understanding of it, this court would not hesitate to adopt that construction.

Id. (230) 407

3. If the State of Georgia had practically settled the limits of Franklin County, such settlement ought to have been conclusive on the Circuit Court.

Id. (232) 408

GRANTS OF LAND—2.

1. In the nature of things, we perceive no reason why the grant of the land in controversy, should not be good for land which it might lawfully pass; and void as to that part of the tract for the granting of which the office had not been open. It is every day's practice to make grants for lands which have in part been granted to others. It has never been suggested, that the whole grant is void, because a part of the land was not grantable.

Patterson's Lessee v. Jenks, (235) 409

2. The principle, that a patent conveying lands lying partly within and partly without the territory retained by the Indians, was void as to so much as lay within it, and valid for the residue, was settled by this court in the case of Danforth v. Wear (9 Wheaton, 673). This decision was made on a patent depending on the statutes of North Carolina, which contain prohibitions at least as strong as those of Georgia.

HABEAS CORPUS—3.

1. A petition was presented by Tobias Watkins for a habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the legality of his confinement in the gaol of the County of Washington, by virtue of a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States of the District of Columbia, rendered in a criminal prosecution instituted against him in that court. The petitioner alleged that the indictments under which he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, charge no offense for which the prisoner was punishable in that court, or of which that court could take cognizance; and, consequently, that the proceedings were coram non judice. The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction in criminal cases which could reverse or affirm a judgment rendered in the Circuit Court in such a case, where the record is brought up directly by writ of error.

Ex-parte Tobias Watkins, (201) 653

2. The power of this court to award writs of habeas corpus is conferred expressly on the court by the fourteenth section of the Judicial Act, and has been repeatedly exercised. No doubt exists respecting the power. No law of the United States prescribes the cases in which this great writ shall be issued, nor the power of the court over the party brought up by it. The term used in the Constitution is one which is well understood, and the Judicial Act authorizes the court, and all the courts of the United States and the judges thereof, to issue the writ "for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment.

INJUNCTION—2.

If the complainants in the Circuit Court were proved to be the regularly appointed committee of a voluntary society of Lutherans in actual possession of the premises, and acting by their direction to prevent a disturbance of that possession; under the circumstances of this case, there does not appear to be a serious objection to their right to maintain a suit for a perpetual injunction against the heirs of the donor, who sought to regain the property, and to disturb their possession.

INSOLVENCY—1.

1. What is the nature and effect of the priority of the United States, under the statute of 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (438) 211

2. It is obvious that the latter clause of the 65th section of the Act of 1799 is merely an explanation of the term "insolvency" used in the first clause, and embraces three classes of cases, all of which relate to living debtors. The case of deceased debtors stands wholly upon the alternative in the former part of the enactment.

Id. (439) 212

3. Insolvency, in the sense of the statute, relates to such a general devestment of property as would in fact be equivalent to insolvency in its technical sense. It supposes that all the debtor's property has passed from him. This was the language of the decision in the case of the United States v. Hooe (3 Cranch, 73), and it was consequently held that an assignment of part of the debtor's property did not fall within the provision of the statute.

Id. (Ib.) 212

4. Mere inability of the debtor to pay all his debts is not an insolvency within the statute; but it must be manifested in one of the three modes pointed out in the explanatory clause of the section.

INSOLVENT LAWS OF THE STATES OF THE UNITED STATES—3.

The plaintiff below, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, instituted a suit against the defendant, a citizen of Louisiana, for the recovery of a debt incurred in 1808, and the defendant pleaded his discharge by the bankrupt law of Louisiana in 1811; under which, according to the provisions of the law, "as well his person as his future effects" were forever discharged "from all the claims of his creditors." Under this law the plaintiff, whose debt was specified in the list of defendant's creditors, received a dividend of ten per cent. on his debt, declared by the assignees of the defendant. Held, that the plaintiff, by voluntarily making himself a party to those proceedings, abandoned his extra-territorial immunity from the operation of the bankrupt law of Louisiana; and was bound by that law to the same extent to which the citizens of Louisiana were bound.

Clay v. Smith, (411) 723

INSOLVENT LAW OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

1. The 2d, 3d and 4th sections of the Act of January 6, 1800, entitled "An Act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts," make provision for the discharge of persons confined under execution; and the 5th section extends "the privileges and relief" of that act, to persons in confinement, against whom judgment is obtained, but no execution issued. Under the provisions in favor of persons charged in execution, on the day of arrest, a notice may be served upon the person at whose suit they may be confined, and at the end of thirty days they may be discharged. By the 5th section it is enacted, "that any person imprisoned upon process issuing from any court of the United States, except at the suit of the United States in any civil action, against whom judgment has been or shall be recovered, shall be entitled to the privileges and relief provided by this act after the expiration of thirty days from the time such judgment has been or shall be recovered; though the creditor should not within that time sue out his execution, and charge the debtor therewith." It has been argued that under this section the defendant must remain in prison thirty days after judgment, before he can sue out his notice to the plaintiff; thus requiring him to remain sixty days in confinement in the cases which come under this section, whereas he remains but thirty days when confined under execution. There can be no reason for this distinction; and in favor of liberty, and with a view to consistency, the construction should be otherwise. If such were the true construction, the relief would not be the same as is extended to debtors of the other class. The day of entering judgment under the 5th section, is the day that corresponds to the day of arrest, under the previous provisions of the law, and therefore in thirty days after the judgment, the defendant may be discharged; complying with the other requisitions of the law.

Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, (350) 448

2. Where the agent of the plaintiff agreed in writing to dispense with the imprisonment required by law, to entitle the defendant to be discharged, under the insolvent law of the United States; and the defendant who was in confinement was discharged without having been imprisoned thirty days, this was not such a proceeding as would bar the assignee of the note to recover against a subsequent assignor. The object of the imprisonment is to give the plaintiff an opportunity to ascertain the situation of the defendant, and if he does not require this, it may be waived without prejudice to his claims on others.

Id. (351) 448

3. A discharge under the insolvent laws of the United States is confined in its effects altogether to the particular cause; and even as to that, does not exempt the debtor's present effects, or future acquisition from the process of the law. Nor is his person exempt from confinement for the same debt, should he be detected in a fraud upon the creditor.

Id. (353) 449

INSURABLE INTEREST—1.

The master of a vessel, to whom property shipped on board of a vessel under his command is to be consigned, in the absence of proof that the owner of the property had not given authority to order insurance, has an insurable interest in the property on board his vessel; and this interest is sufficient to authorize the recovery of a loss on the policy.

Buck & Hedrick v. The Chesapeake Insurance Company, (163) 96

INSURABLE INTEREST—2.

1. L. & P. at the time an insurance was made for them against loss by fire, were entitled to one-third of the property by deed, and to two-thirds as mortgagees; but one moiety of the whole was held under an agreement which had not been complied with, and which purported on its face to be void if not complied with; but the other contracting party had not declared it void, nor called for a compliance with it. L. & P. had an insurable interest in the property.

The Columbian Insurance Company v. Lawrence, (46) 343

2. That an equitable interest may be insured is admitted; and we can perceive no reason which excludes an interest held under an executory contract. While the contract subsists, the person claiming under it has, undoubtedly, a substantial interest in the property. If it be destroyed the loss in contemplation of law is his. If the purchase money be paid, it is his in fact. If he owes the purchase money the property is equivalent and is still valuable to him. The embarrassments of his affairs may be such that his debt may absorb all his property; but this circumstance has never been considered as proving a want of interest in it. The destruction of the property is a real loss to the person in possession, who claims title under an executory contract; and the contingency, that his title may be defeated by subsequent events, does not prevent this loss.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

The Columbian Insurance Company v. Lawrence, (46) 343

INSURANCE—1.

1. To affirm that "in policies for whom it may concern," there can be no undue concealment as to the parties interested in the property to be insured," is obviously going much too far; since the underwriter has an unquestionable right to be informed, if he makes the inquiry. The assured may be silent, it is true, if he will; and let the premium be charged accordingly; but if the inquiry, when made, should be responded to by information contrary to the verity of the case, this obviously gives a conventional signification to the terms of the policy, which may differ from the known and received signification in ordinary cases.

Buck & Hedrick v. The Chesapeake Insurance Company, (159) 94

2. A policy "for whom it may concern" will, in ordinary cases, cover belligerent property.

Id. (160) 94

3. A knowledge of the state of the world—of the allegiance of particular countries—of the risks and embarrassments affecting their commerce—of the course and incidents of the trade on which they insure, and of the established import of the terms used in their contracts, must necessarily be imputed to underwriters.

Id. (1b.) 94

4. The term interest, as used in application to the right to insure does not necessarily imply property, in the subject of insurance.

Id. (163) 96

5. The master of a vessel, to whom property shipped on board the vessel under his command is to be consigned, in the absence of proof that the owner of the property had not given authority to order insurance, has an insurable interest in the property on board his vessel; and this interest is sufficient to authorize the recovery of a loss on the policy.

7. Every ship must, at the commencement of the voyage insured, possess all the qualities of seaworthiness, and be navigated by a competent master and crew.

M'Lanahan v. The Universal Insurance Company, (183) 104

8. Seaworthiness in port, or while lying in the offing, may be one thing; and seaworthiness for the whole voyage, quite another.

Id. (184) 104

9. A policy on a ship, "at and from a port," will attach; although the ship be, at the time, undergoing extensive repairs in port—so as, in a general sense, for the purposes of the whole voyage, to be utterly unseaworthy.

Id. (1b.) 104

10. What is a competent crew for the voyage—at what time such crew should be on board—what is proper pilot ground—what is the course and usage of trade, in relation to the master and crew being on board, when the ship breaks ground for the voyage—are questions of fact dependent upon nautical testimony, and exclusively within the province of the jury.

Id. (1b.) 104

11. The contract of insurance is one of mutual good faith; and the principles which govern it are those of an enlightened moral policy. The underwriter must be presumed to act upon the belief that the party procuring insurance is not, at the time, in possession of any fact material to the risk which he does not disclose; and that no known loss had occurred, which, by reasonable diligence, might have been communicated to him.

Id. (185) 105

12. If a party, knowing that his agent is about to procure insurance for him, withholds information for the purpose of misleading the underwriter, it is a fraud, and vitiates the insurance.

Id. (1b.) 105

13. Where a party orders insurance and afterwards receives intelligence material to the risk, or has knowledge of a loss, he ought to communicate it to the agent by due and reasonable diligence, to be judged under all the circumstances of each particular case, if it can be communicated; for the purpose of countermmanding the order, or laying the circumstances before the underwriter.

Id. (1b.) 105

14. What constitutes due and reasonable diligence is a question of fact for the jury.

Id. (186) 105

15. The accidental concealment of the time of the sailing of a vessel would not prejudice the insurance, unless material to the risk; if fraudulently intended, it might not mislead; and whether fraudulent or not, is matter of fact for the jury.

Id. (188) 106

16. The material ingredients of a question of the importance of concealing the time of a vessel's sailing, are mixed up of nautical skill, information, and experience; and are, in no sense, judicially cognizable, as matters of law. It seems that this question does not cease to be a question of fact, when the vessel is to sail from a port abroad.

Id. (1b.) 106

17. The question of the materiality of the time of the sailing of the ship to the risk, is a question for the jury under the direction of the court, as in other cases. The court may aid the judgment of the jury by an exposition of the nature, bearing, and pressure of the facts; but it has no right to supersede the exercise of that judgment, and to direct an absolute verdict as upon contested matters of fact resolving itself into a mere point of law.

Id. (191) 107

INSURANCE—2.

In all treatises on insurances and in all the cases in which the question has arisen, the principle is, that a misrepresentation which is material to the risk, avoids the policy.

The Columbian Insurance Company v. Lawrence, (49) 344

INSURANCE—3.

1. Insurance on profits on board the ship Mary "at and from Philadelphia to Gibraltar and a port in the Mediterranean not higher up than Marseilles, and from thence to Sonsonate in Guatemala, Pacific Ocean, with liberty of Guayaquil, the insurance to begin from the loading of the goods at Philadelphia, and to continue until the goods were safely landed at the said ports. The insurance, five thousand dollars, declared to be on profits warranted to be American property, to be proved at Philadelphia only, valued at twenty thousand dollars." The vessel proceeded with a cargo of flour to Gibraltar, where the same was to be sold and the proceeds invested at Marseilles in dry goods to be sent from thence to Sonsonate or Guayaquil. While the vessel lay at Gibraltar, before the discharge of her cargo, she and her cargo were totally lost by fire. The evidence on the trial went to show that with proper diligence on the part of the captain and crew, the fire might have been extinguished and the vessel and cargo saved. Soon after the fire commenced, the captain called upon the crew to leave the ship, under an apprehension from a small quantity of gunpowder on board; and after they left her she was boarded by other persons, who endeavored without success to extinguish the flames, having, as was alleged, arrived too late. Evidence was given, intended to show that the fire originated from the carelessness of the captain. The Circuit Court refused to instruct the jury that if the fire proceeded from the carelessness or negligence of the captain, the insured could not recover. The court also refused to instruct the jury that if the fire originated from accident, or without any want of due care on the part of the master and crew, and if the jury should find that by reasonable and proper exertions the vessel and cargo might have been preserved by them, which they omitted, the assured could not recover. That court also refused to instruct the jury that the assured, having offered no evidence that the sales of the flour at Gibraltar would have yielded a profit, they were not entitled to recover. Held, that there was no error in these instructions.

2. What is barratry? Its definition.

Id. (1b.) 662

3. The British courts have adopted the safe and legal rule, in deciding that where the policy covers the risk of barratry and fire is the proximate cause of the loss, they will not sustain the defense that negligence was the remote cause, and will hold the assurers liable for the loss.

The Patapasco Insurance Company v. Coulter, (236) 664

4. The rule that a loss, the proximate cause of which is a peril insured against is a loss within the policy, although the remote cause may be negligence of the master or mariners, has been affirmed in several successive cases in the English courts.

Id. (237) 665

5. It seems difficult to perceive, if profit be a mere excrescence of the principal, as some judges have said; or identified with it, as has been said by others; why the loss of the cargo should not carry with it the loss of the profits. Proof that profits would have arisen on the voyage, in order to recover on a policy on profits, is not required if the cargo has been lost.

INSURANCE—4.

1. Action on a policy of insurance on the brig Hope, from Alexandria to Barbadoes, and back to the United States. On the outward voyage, the Hope put into Hampton Roads for a harbor during an approaching storm, and was driven on shore above high water-mark. A survey was held, and she was recommended to be sold for the benefit of all concerned. The assured abandoned, and there was no pretense but that the injury which the vessel had sustained justified the abandonment. The question in the case was whether, by the acts of the assured, the abandonment had not been revoked. There can be no doubt but that the revocation of an abandonment before accepted by the underwriters may be inferred from the conduct of the assured; if his acts and interference with the use and management of the subject insured be such as satisfactorily to show that he intended to act as owner, and not for the benefit of the underwriters. But this is always a question of intention, to be collected from the circumstances of the case, and belongs to the jury as matter of fact, and is not to be decided by the court as matter of law.

The Columbian Insurance Company v. Ashby and Stribling, (139) 809

2. In the case of the Chesapeake Insurance Company v. Stark (2 Cond. Rep., 367) this court lays down the general rule, that if an abandonment be legally made, it puts the underwriter completely in the place of the assured, and the agent of the latter becomes the agent of the former; and that the acts of the agent interfering with the subject insured will not affect the abandonment. But the court takes a distinction between the acts of an agent and the acts of the assured. That in the latter case, any acts of ownership by the owner himself might be construed into a relinquishment of the abandonment, which had not been accepted. But the court in that case did not say, and we think did not mean to be considered as intimating, that every such act of ownership must necessarily, and under all possible circumstances, be construed into a relinquishment of an abandonment. The practical operation of so broad a rule would be extremely injurious.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE—2.

1. The material inquiry is, does the offer for insurance state truly the interest of the assured in the property to be insured? The offer describes the property as belonging to Lawrence & Poindexter, and states it afterwards to be their stone mill. It contains no qualifying terms, which should lead the mind to suspect that their title was not complete and absolute. The title of the assured was subject to contingencies, and was held under contracts which had become void by the nonperformance of the same. This court is of opinion, that a precarious title depeuding for its continuance on events which might or might not happen, is not such a title as is described in this offer for insurance; construing the words of that offer as they are fairly to be understood.

Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, (48) 344

2. The contract for insurance against fire, is one in which the underwriter generally acts on the representation of the assured; and that representation ought consequently to be fair, and to omit nothing which it is material to the underwriter to know. It may not be necessary that the person requiring insurance should state every incumbrance on his property, which it might be required of him to state if it was offered for sale; but fair dealing requires that he should state everything which might influence the mind of the underwriter in forming or declining the contract.

INTEREST—3.

1. The taking of interest in advance upon the discount of a note in the usual course of business by a banker, is not usury. This has long been settled, and is not now open for controversy.

Thornton v. The Bank of Washington, (40) 595

2. The taking of interest for sixty-four days on a note is not usury, if the note given for sixty days, according to the custom and usage in the banks at Washington, was not due and payable until the sixty-fourth day. In the case of Renner v. The Bank of Columbia (9 Wheat., 581), it was expressly held, that under that custom the note was not due and payable before the sixty-fourth day, for until that time the maker could not be in default.

Id. (1b.) 595

3. Where it was the practice of the party who had a sixty day note discounted at the Bank of Washington to renew the note by the discount of another note on the sixty-third day, the maker not being in fact bound to pay the note according to the custom prevailing in the District of Columbia; such a transaction on the part of the banker is not usurious, although on each note the discount for sixty-four days was deducted. Each note is considered as a distinct and substantive transaction. If no more than legal interest is taken upon the time the new note has to run, the actual application of the proceeds of the new note to the payment of the former note before it comes due, does not of itself make the transaction usurious. Something more must occur. There must be a contract between the bank and the party at the time of such discount, that the party shall not have the use and benefit of the proceeds until the former note becomes due, or that the bank shall have the use and benefit of them in the meantime.

1. The contract to accept the bills of exchange on which the action was brought, was made in Charleston, South Carolina. The bills were drawn in Georgia on B. & H. in Charleston, with a view to their payment in Charleston, where the contract was to be executed. Hollingsworth v. Barbour et al., (466) 922

JURISDICTION—1.

1. In the construction of the 25th section of the Judicial Act, passed 24th of September, 1789, this court has never required that the treaty or act of Congress under which the party claims, who brings the final judgment of a State court into review before this court, should have been spread upon the record. It has always deemed it essential to the exercise of jurisdiction in such a case, that the record should show a complete title under the treaty or act of Congress, and that the judgment of the court is in violation of that treaty or act.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Hickie v. Starke et al., (98) 69

2. In the District Court of the United States for the District of Georgia, a libel was filed claiming certain Africans as the property of the libellant, which had been brought into the State of Georgia, and were seized by the authority of the Governor of the State, for an alleged illegal importation; process was issued against the slaves, but was not served. The case was taken by appeal to the Circuit Court, and the Governor of Georgia filed a paper, in the nature of a stipulation, importing to hold the Africans subject to the decree of the Circuit Court, etc. Held, that such a stipulation could not give jurisdiction in the case to the Circuit Court; as process could not issue legally from the Circuit Court against the Africans, because it would be the exercise of original jurisdiction in admiralty, which the Circuit Court does not possess.

The Governor of Georgia v. Juan Madrazo, (121) 78

4. The libel and claim exhibited a demand for money actually in the treasury of the State of Georgia, mixed up with the general funds of the State, and for slaves in the possession of the government; the possession of both of which was acquired by means which it was lawful in the State to exercise. Held, that the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction, the same being taken away by the 11th article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

5. In a case where the chief magistrate of a State issued, not by his name, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, the State itself may be considered a party in the record.

Id., (124) 79

6. The complainants are stated in the bill to be citizens of the State of South Carolina. The defendant, the Bank of Georgia, is a body corporate, existing under an act of the Legislature; but the citizenship of the individual corporators is not stated. The averment in the original bill is, that William B. Bullock and Samuel Hale are citizens of Georgia, and residents therein; William B. Bullock is afterwards designated in the bill as "President of the Mother Bank, and Samuel Hale as the President of the Branch Bank at Augusta, in the State of Georgia." The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction of the case. The record does not show that the defendants were citizens of Georgia, nor are there any distinct allegations that the stockholders of the bank were citizens of that State.

Breithaupt et al. v. The Bank of Georgia et al., (238) 127

7. The court will not take jurisdiction of a case, where, although the whole property claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff in error under a patent, and which was recovered in ejectment, exceeded two thousand dollars, the title to a lot of ground, part of the whole tract, which was of less value than five hundred dollars, was only involved in the case before the court.

Old Grant, ex dem. Meredith, v. McKee et al., (248) 131

8. If the court of a State had jurisdiction of a matter, its decision would be conclusive; but this court cannot yield assent to the proposition that the jurisdiction of a State court cannot be questioned, where its proceedings were brought, collaterally, before the Circuit Court of the United States.

Elliott v. Peirsol, (340) 170

9. Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide any question which occurs in the cause; and whether its decision be correct, or otherwise, its judgments, until reversed, are regarded as binding in every other court. But if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void, and form no bar to a remedy sought in opposition to them, even prior to a reversal. They constitute no justification, and all persons concerned in execut-

Id., (1b.) 170

13. The Constitution and laws of the United States give jurisdiction to the district courts over all cases in admiralty; but jurisdiction over the case, does not constitute the case itself.

The American Insurance Company v. 356 Bales of Cotton, (545) 256

14. The Constitution declares that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases of law and equity arising under it—the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority—to all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The Constitution certainly contemplates these as three distinct classes of cases; and if they are distinct, the grant of jurisdiction over one of them does not confer jurisdiction over either of the other two. The discrimination made between them is conclusive against their identity.

Id., (1b.) 256

15. A case in admiralty does not, in fact, arise under the Constitution or laws of the United States. Such cases are as old as navigation itself; and the law admiralty and maritime, as it existed for ages, is applied by our courts to the cases as they arise. It is not, then, to the eighth section of the Territorial Act, that we are to look for the grant of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the Territorial courts of Florida. Consequently, if that jurisdiction is exclusive, it is not made so by the reference in the act of Congress to the District Court of Kentucky.

Id., (1b.) 256

16. The Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction of appeals from the Orphans' Court, through the Circuit Court for the County of Washington, by virtue of the Act of Congress of February 13th, 1801; and by the act of Congress subsequently passed, the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, must exceed the value of $1,000 in order to entitle the party to an appeal.

Nichols et al. v. Hodges' Executors, (565) 264

17. It cannot be alleged that a citizen of one State, having title to lands in another State, is disabled from suing for those lands in the courts of the United States, by the fact that he derives his title from a citizen of the State in which the lands lie.

McDonald v. Smalley et al., (623) 288

18. M., a citizen of Ohio, apprehensive his title to lands in that State could not be maintained in the State court, and being indebted to the plaintiff, a citizen of Alabama, to the amount of $1,100, offered to sell and convey to him the land in payment of the debt, stating in the letter by which the offer was made, that the title would most probably be maintained in the courts of the United States, but would fail in the courts of the State. The property was estimated at more than the debt, but in consequence of the difficulties attending the title he was willing to convey it for the debt, which was done. The plaintiff in error, after the land was conveyed to him, gave his bond to make a quit-claim title to the land on condition of receiving $1,000. Held, that the title acquired by the purchaser gave jurisdiction to the courts of the United States.

Id., (1b.) 288

19. The motives which induced M. to make the contract for the purchase of the land can have no influence on its validity. A court cannot enter into the consideration of those motives, when deciding on its jurisdiction.

21. Both the plaintiff and defendants claimed title under the provisions of the Act of Congress passed March 3d, 1803, entitled "An Act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee;" and the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi was upon the construction given to that act by the commissioners acting under its authority. This is a case which draws into question the construction of an act of Congress, and the Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction on a writ of error, by which the decision of the court of the State of Mississippi is brought up for revision under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

Ross v. Barland et al.,

(655) 302

JURISDICTION—2.

1. The 11th section of the Act of 1789, must be construed in connection with and in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. By this latter, the judicial power does not extend to private suits in which an alien is party, unless a citizen be the adverse party; and it is indispensable to aver the citizenship of the defendants, to show, on the record, the jurisdiction of the court.

Jackson v. Twentyman,

(136) 374

2. When the proceedings of a court of competent jurisdiction are brought before another court collaterally, they are by no means subject to all the exceptions which might be taken to them on a direct appeal. The general and well settled rule of law in such cases is, that when the proceedings are collaterally drawn in question, and it appears on the face of them that the subject matter was within the jurisdiction of the court, they are voidable only. The errors and irregularities of any suit are to be corrected by some direct proceeding, either before the same court to set them aside, or in an appellate court. If there is a total want of jurisdiction, the proceedings are void, and a mere nullity, and confer no right and afford no justification, and may be rejected when collaterally drawn in question.

Thompson v. Tolmie,

5. The value of the interest a guardian has in the minor's estate, is not the value of the estate, but that of the office of guardian. This is of no pecuniary value except so far as it affords a compensation for labors and services; and in a controversy between persons claiming adversely as guardians, having no distinct interest of their own, it cannot be considered as amounting to a sufficient sum to authorize an appeal to the court, from a circuit court of the District of Columbia.

Ritchie v. Mauro et al.,

(243) 411

6. This court has frequently decided that to sustain its jurisdiction in appeals and writs of error, it is not necessary to state in terms upon the record that the Constitution or a law of the United States was drawn in question. It is sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the 25th section of the Judicial Act, if the record shows that the Constitution or a law of the United States must have been misconstrued, or the decision could not have been made; or that the constitutionality of a State law was questioned and the decision was in favor of the party claiming under such law.

Wilson et al. v. The Black Bird Creek

Marsh Company,

(250) 414

7. In an action for money had and received for the recovery of the amount of a deposit made in the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, acting under an act of incorporation passed by the Legislature of that State, the defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction on the ground that the State of Kentucky alone was the proprietor of the stock of the bank; for which reason it was insisted that the suit was virtually against a sovereign State. The court are of opinion that the question is no longer open here. The case of The United States Bank v. The Planters' Bank of Georgia (9 Wheaton, 904), was a much stronger case for the plaintiffs in error than the present; for there the State of Georgia was not only a proprietor, but a proprietor. Here the State is not a proprietor, since by the terms of the Act incorporating this bank, "the president and directors" alone constitute the body corporate, the metaphysical person liable to suit. Hence by the law of the State itself it is excluded from the character of a party in the sense of this law when speaking of a corporation. It may be added to the reasons which influenced the court in their opinion in the case of The Bank of the United States v. The Planters' Bank of Georgia that if a State did exercise the powers in and over a bank or impart to it its sovereign attributes, it would be hardly possible to distinguish the issue of the paper of such a bank, from a direct issue of bills of credit; which violation of the constitution, no doubt, the State here intended to avoid.

8. The bills of a bank were payable to an individual or bearer, and in the action upon the bills there was no averment of the citizenship of the person to whom the bills are payable, and they might therefore have been payable, in the first instance, to a party not competent to sue in the courts of the United States. This court has uniformly held that a note payable to bearer is payable to anybody, and is not effected by the disabilities of the nominal payee.

(326) 439

9. Objections to the jurisdiction of this court have been frequently made on the ground that there was nothing apparent on the record to raise the question whether the court from which the case has been brought, had decided upon the constitutionality of a law, so that the case was within the provisions of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789. This has given occasion for a critical examination of the section which has resulted in the adoption of certain principles of construction applicable to it. One of those principles is that if the repugnancy of a statute of a State to the Constitution of the United States was drawn into question, or if that question was applicable to the case, this court has jurisdiction of the cause: although the record should not in terms state a misconstruction of the Constitution of the United States; or that the repugnancy of the statute of the State, to any part of that Constitution, was drawn into question.

Satterlee v. Matthewson,

(409) 467

10. The power of this court to revise the judgment of State tribunals, depends on the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. That section enacts, "that a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State, in which a decision in the suit could be had," where is drawn in question the validity of a statute, or of an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity, "may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States."

Charleston,

(463) 486

11. The city council of Charleston, exercising an authority under the State of South Carolina, enacted an ordinance by which a tax was imposed on the six and seven per cent. stock of the United States; and in the Court of Common Pleas of the Charleston District, an application was made for a prohibition to restrain them from levying the tax on the ground that the ordinance violated the Constitution of the United States. The prohibition was granted and the proceedings in the case were removed to the Constitutional Court, the highest court of law of the State; and in that court it was held that the ordinance did not violate the Constitution of the United States, and a writ of error was prosecuted on this decision to this court. Held, that the question decided by the Constitutional Court was the very question on which the revising power of this court is to be exercised.

If an alien should sue a citizen, and should omit to state the character of the parties in the bill, though the court could not exercise jurisdiction while the defect in the bill remained, yet it might, as is every day's practice, be corrected at any time before the hearing, and the court would not hesitate to decree in the cause.

Id.

(Ib.) 521

19. The suit was originally instituted by aliens and a citizen of the United States as complainants, against the defendants, citizens of the United States. In the progress of the cause, and before the final hearing, the name of the citizen of the United States who was one of the plaintiffs, was struck out and he was made a defendant by the court. It was held: The substantial parties, plaintiffs, those for whose benefit the decree is sought, are aliens, and the court has original jurisdiction between them and all the defendants. But they prevented the exercise of this jurisdiction by uniting with themselves a person between whom and one of the defendants the court could not take jurisdiction; strike out his name as a complainant, and the impediment is removed to the exercise of that original jurisdiction which the court possessed between the alien parties, and all the citizen defendants. There is no objection, founded on convenience or law, to this course.

JURISDICTION—3.

1. The plaintiff below claimed more than two thousand dollars in his declaration, but obtained a judgment for a less sum. The jurisdiction of this court depends on the sum or value in dispute between the parties, as the case stands upon the writ of error in this court, not on that which was in dispute in the Circuit Court.

Gordon v. Ogden,

(34) 593

2. If the writ of error be brought by the plaintiff below, then the sum which the declaration shows to be due may be still recovered should the judgment for a smaller sum be reversed, and, consequently, the whole sum claimed is still in dispute.

Id.

(Ib.) 593

3. But if the writ of error be brought by the defendant in the original action, the judgment of this court can only affirm that of the Circuit Court, and, consequently, the matter in dispute cannot exceed the amount of that judgment. Nothing but that judgment is in dispute between the parties.

Id.

(Ib.) 593

4. A judgment in its nature concludes the subject on which it is rendered, and pronounces the law of the case. The judgment of the court of record whose jurisdiction is final is as conclusive on all the world as the judgment of this court would be. It is as conclusive on this court as on other courts. It puts an end to inquiry concerning the fact, by deciding it.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Ex-parte Tobias Watkins,

(202) 653

5. With what propriety can this court look into an indictment found in the Circuit Court, and which has passed into judgment before that court? We have no power to examine the proceedings on a writ of error, and it would be strange, if under color of a writ to liberate an individual from an unlawful imprisonment, the court could substantially reverse a judgment which the law has placed beyond its control. An imprisonment under a judgment cannot be unlawful, unless that judgment be an absolute nullity; and it is not a nullity if the court has general jurisdiction of the subject, although it should be erroneous.

Id.

(203) 653

6. The Circuit Court for the District of Columbia is a court of record, having general jurisdiction over criminal cases. An offense cognizable in any court is cognizable in that court.

Id.

(Ib.) 653

7. If the offense be punishable by law, that court is competent to inflict the punishment. The judgment of such a tribunal has all the obligation which the judgment of any tribunal can have. To determine whether the offenses charged in the indictment be legally punishable or not, is among the most unquestionable of its powers and duties. The decision of this question is the exercise of its jurisdiction, whether its judgment be for or against the prisoner. The judgment is equally binding in one case and in the other, and must remain in full force, unless reversed regularly by a superior court capable of reversing it. If this judgment is obligatory, no court can ever look behind it.

Id.

(Ib.) 653

8. Had any offense against the laws of the United States been in fact committed, the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia could take cognizance of it. The question whether any offense was committed, or was not committed; that is, whether the indictment did or did not show that an offense had been committed, was a question which this court was competent to decide. If its judgment was erroneous, a point which this court does not determine, still it is a judgment; and until reversed, cannot be disregarded.

Id.

(Ib.) 653

9. It is universally understood that the judgments of the courts of the United States, although their jurisdiction be not shown on the pleadings, are yet binding on all the world, and that this apparent want of jurisdiction can avail the party only on a writ of error. The judgment of the Circuit Court in a criminal case is of itself evidence of its own legality, and requires for its support no inspection of the indictment on which it is founded. The law trusts that court with the whole subject, and has not confided to this court the power of revising its decisions. This court cannot usurp that power by the instrumentality of a writ of habeas corpus. The judgment informs us that the commitment is legal, and with that information it is our duty to be satisfied.

Id.

(207) 654

10. This court has been often called upon to consider the sixteenth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, and as often, either expressly or by the course of its decisions, has held that it is merely declaratory, making no alteration whatever in the rules of equity on the subject of legal remedy.

12. It is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or in other words, as practical and as efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity.

D'Wolf v. Usher,

(269) 675

14. This court has no authority, on a writ of error from a State court, to declare a State law void on account of its collision with a State constitution; it not being a case embraced in the Judiciary Act, which gives the power of a writ of error to the highest judicial tribunal of the State.

Jackson v. Lamphire,

(238) 682

15. The plaintiff in error claimed to recover the land in controversy, having derived his title under a patent granted by the State of New York to John Cornelius. He insisted that the patent created a contract between the State and the patentee, his heirs and assigns, that they should enjoy the land free from any legislative regulations to be made in violation of the constitution of the State, and that an act passed by the Legislature of New York, subsequent to the patent, did violate that contract. Under that act commissioners were appointed to investigate the contending titles to all the lands held under such patents as that granted to John Cornelius, and by their proceedings, without the aid of a jury, the title of the defendants in error was established against, and defeating the title under a deed made by John Cornelius, the patentee, and which deed was executed under the patent. This is not a case within the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits a State from passing laws which shall impair the obligation of contracts. The only contract made by the State is a grant to John Cornelius, his heirs and assigns, of the land. The patent contains no covenant to do or not to do any further act in relation to the land, and the court are not inclined to create a contract by implication. The act of the Legislature of New York does not attempt to take the land from the patentee, the grant remains in full effect; and the proceedings of the commissioners under the law, operated upon titles derived under, and not adversely to the patent.

Id.

(239) 682

16. It is within the undoubted powers of State Legislatures to pass recording acts by which the elder grantee shall be postponed to a younger, if the prior deed is not recorded within a limited time; and the power is the same whether the deed is dated before or after the recording act. Though the effect of such a deed is to render the prior deed fraudulent and void against a subsequent purchaser, it is not a law violating the obligation of contracts. So, too, is the power to pass limitation laws. Reasons of sound policy have led to the general adoption of laws of this description, and their validity cannot be questioned. The time and manner of their operation, the exceptions to them, and the acts from which the time limited shall begin to run, will generally depend on the sound discretion of the Legislature, according to the nature of the titles, the situation of the country, and the emergency which leads to their enactment. Cases may occur where the provisions of a law on these subjects may be so unreasonable as to amount to a denial of a right, and to call for the interposition of this court.

Id.

(290) 683

17. It has often been decided in this court that it is not necessary that it shall appear, in terms, upon the record, that the question was presented in the State court, whether the case was within the purview of the twenty-fifth section of the Judicial Act of 1789 to give jurisdiction to this court in a case removed from a State court. It is sufficient, if, from the facts stated, such a question must have arisen, and the judgment of the State court would not have been what it is if there had not been a misconstruction of some act of Congress, &c., &c., or a decision against the validity of the right, title, privilege, or exemption set up under it.

Harris v. Dennie,

(292) 683

18. Where the verdict for the plaintiff in the Circuit Court is for a less amount than two thousand dollars, and the defendant prosecutes the writ of error, this court has not jurisdiction, although the demand of the plaintiff in the suit exceeded two thousand dollars.

Smith v. Honey,

JURISDICTION—4.

1. The action was assumpsit on a promissory note, and the record stated "that neither party having required a jury, the cause was submitted to the court; and the court having seen and heard the evidence, the court found that the defendants did assume as the plaintiff had declared; that the consideration for the note and the assumpsit was for loan-office certificates, loaned by the State of Missouri at her loan-office in Chariton, which certificates were issued under an act for establishing loan offices, &c." Held, that it could not be doubted that the declaration is on a note given in pursuance of the act of Missouri; and that under the plea of non assumpsit, the defendants were at liberty to question the validity of the consideration which was the foundation of the contract, and the constitutionality of the law in which it originated. The record, thus exhibiting the case, gives jurisdiction to this court over the case on a writ of error prosecuted by the defendants to this court from the Supreme Court of Missouri, under the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—2.

Every demise between landlord and tenant in respect to matters in which the parties are silent, may be fairly open to explanation by the general usage and custom of the country, or of the district where the lands lie. Every person, under such circumstances, is supposed to be conversant of this custom, and to contract with a tacit reference to it.

Van Ness v. Pacard,

(148) 378

LANDLORD AND TENANT—3.

1. It is an undoubted principle of law, fully recognized by this court, that a tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord, either by setting up a title in himself or a third person, during the existence of the lease or tenancy. The principle of estoppel applies to the relation between them, and operates with full force to prevent the tenant from violating the contract by which he claimed and held the possession. He cannot change the character of the tenure by his own act merely, so as to enable himself to hold against his landlord, who reposes under the security of the tenancy, believing the possession of the tenant to be his own, held under his title, and ready to be surrendered by its termination, by the lapse of time or demand of possession.

Willson v. Watkins,

(47) 598

2. The same principle applies to a mortgagee and mortgagor, trustee and cestui que trust, and generally, to all cases where one man obtains possession of real estate belonging to another by a recognition of his title.

Id.

(48) 598

3. In no instance has the principle of law which protects the relations between landlord and tenant been carried so far as in this case, which presents a disclaimer by a tenant with the knowledge of his landlord, and an unbroken possession afterwards for such a length of time that the act of limitations has run out four times before he has done any act to assert his right to the land.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Willison v. Watkins (48) 598

4. If no length of time would protect a possession originally acquired under a lease, it would be productive of evils truly alarming, and we must be convinced beyond a doubt that the law is so settled before we would give our sanction to such a doctrine, and this is not the case upon authorities.

Id. (51) 599

5. Where a tenant disclaims to hold under his lease, he becomes a trespasser, and his possession is adverse, and as open to the action of his landlord as a possession acquired originally by wrong. The act is conclusive on the tenant. He cannot revoke his disclaimer and adverse claim, so as to protect himself during the unexpired time of the lease. He is a trespasser on him who has the legal title. The relation of landlord and tenant is dissolved, and each party is to stand upon his right.

Id. (49) 599

6. If the tenant disclaims the tenure, claims the fee adversely in right of a third person or in his own right, or attorns to another, his possession then becomes a tortious one by the forfeiture of his right, and the landlord's right of entry is complete, and he may sue at any time within the period of limitation; but he must lay his demise of a day subsequent to the termination of the tenancy, for before that he had no right of entry. By bringing his ejectment he disclaims the tenancy and goes for the forfeiture. It shall not be permitted to the landlord to thus admit that there is no tenure subsisting between him and the tenant which can protect his possession from this adversary suit, and at the same time recover on the ground of there being a tenure so strong as that he cannot set up his adversary possession.

Id. (1b.) 599

7. A mortgagee, or direct purchaser from a tenant, or one who buys his right at a sheriff's sale, assumes his relation to the landlord with all its legal consequences, and is as much estopped from denying the tenancy.

Id. (50) 599

LANDS AND LAND TITLES—1.

1. In order to bring himself within the protection of the Act of Cession by the State of Georgia to the United States, the party must show that he was "actually settled" on the land on the 27th of October, 1795, the period mentioned in the said Act of Cession.

Hickie v. Starke, et al., (98) 69

2. It seems that a settlement made on the land by another person, who cultivated it for the proprietor, would be sufficient to constitute "an actual settlement" within the meaning of the law, though the proprietor should not reside in person on the estate, or within the territory.

Id. (1b.) 69

3. Construction of the Act of Congress passed March 2d, 1807, entitled "An Act to extend the time for locating Virginia military warrants, for returning surveys thereon to the office of the Secretary of the Department of War, and appropriating lands for the use of schools in the Virginia military reservation, in lieu of those heretofore appropriated.

Jackson v. Clark, et al., (634) 293

4. The reservation made by the law of Virginia of 1783, ceding to Congress the territory north-west of the Ohio River is not a reservation of the whole tract of country between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami. It is a reservation of only so much of it as may be necessary to make up the deficiency of good lands in the country set apart for the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on the continental establishment on the south-east side of the Ohio. The residue of the lands are ceded to the United States, as a common fund for those States who were or might become members of the Union, to be disposed of for that purpose.

Id. (635) 293

5. Although the military rights constituted the primary claim upon the trust, that claim was, according to the intention of the parties, so to be satisfied as still to keep in view the interests of the Union, which were also a vital object of the trust. This was only to be effected by prescribing the time in which the lands to be appropriated by these claimants, should be separated from the general mass, so as to enable the government to apply the residue to the general purposes of the trust.

Id. (1b.) 293

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

6. If the right existed in Congress to prescribe a time within which military warrants should be located, the right to annex conditions to its extension, follows as a necessary consequence.

Id. (1b.) 293

7. If it be conceded that the proviso in the Act of March 2d, 1807, was not intended for the protection of surveys which were in themselves absolutely void, it must be admitted that it was intended to protect those which were defective, and which might be avoided for irregularity. If this effect be denied to the proviso, it becomes itself a nullity.

Id. (1b.) 293

8. Lands surveyed, are under the law, as completely withdrawn from the common mass as lands patented. It cannot be said that the prohibition, that "no location shall be made on tracts of land for which patents had previously been issued, or which had been previously surveyed," was intended only for valid and regular surveys. They did not require legislative aid. The clause was introduced for the protection of defective entries and surveys, which might be defeated by entries made in quiet times.

Id. (633) 295

9. Under the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1803, entitled "An Act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States, south of the State of Tennessee," such lands only were authorized to be offered for sale as had not been appropriated by the previous sections of the law, and certificates granted by the commissioners in pursuance thereof. A right, therefore, to a particular tract of land derived from a donation certificate given under that law, is superior to the title of any one who purchased the same land at the public sales, unless there is some fatal infirmity in the certificate which renders it void.

Ross v. Bayland et al., (666) 307

10. The Act of Congress requires no precise form for the donation certificate. It is sufficient if the proofs be exhibited to the Court of Commissioners, to satisfy them of the facts entitling the party to the certificate. It is sufficient if the consideration, to wit, the occupancy, and the quantity granted, appears. Nothing more is necessary to certify to the government the party's right, or to enable him, after it is surveyed by the proper officer, to obtain a patent.

Id. (1b.) 307

11. The second section of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1803, was intended to confer a bounty on a numerous class of individuals, and in construing the ambiguous words of the section it is the duty of the court to adopt that construction which will best effect the liberal intentions of the Legislature.

Id. (667) 308

12. The time when the territory over which this law operated was evacuated by the Spanish troops, was very important; as the law was intended to provide for those who were actually at that time inhabitants of, and cultivated the soil within it; but whether it was in 1797 or 1798 was comparatively unimportant. The decision of the commissioners upon the period when the evacuation took place is sufficient; and the court are disposed to adopt the construction of the Act, given by the commissioners west of Pearl River, that the evacuation took place on the 30th of March, 1798, by which persons coming within the objects of the section were entitled to donation certificates.

Id. (1b.) 308

13. Congress have treated as erroneous the construction given to the law by the commissioners to settle claims to lands east of Pearl River, who have decided that only those who were settled on the lands within the territory in the year 1797, were entitled to donation certificates, and who had granted to others pre-emption certificates.

Id. (668) 308

14. The commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress relative to claims to lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, were authorized to hear evidence as to the time of the actual evacuation of the territory by the Spanish troops, and to decide upon the fact. The law gave them power to hear and decide all matters respecting such claims, and to determine thereon according to justice and equity; and declared their deliberations shall be final. The court are bound to presume that every fact necessary to warrant the certificate, in the terms of it, was proved before the commissioners; and that consequently, it was shown to them that the final evacuation of the territory by the Spanish troops took place on the 30th of March, 1798.

Id. (1b.) 308

LANDS AND LAND TITLES—2.

1. The act of the Legislature of Maryland, relative to a devise of the real estate of intestates in certain cases, in directing the commissioners when to give deeds to purchasers, has this general provision: that the commission and proceedings thereon shall be recited in the preamble of the deed. It certainly could not have been intended that the commission, and all the proceedings, should be set out in hæc verba. If the substance of the proceedings is recited, it is sufficient.

Thompson v. Tolmie, (167) 385

2. The law appears to be settled in the States, that courts will go far to sustain bona fide titles acquired under sales made by statutes regulating sales made by order of orphans' courts. Where there has been a fair sale, the purchaser will not be bound to look beyond the decree, if the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction appear on the face of the proceedings.

Id. (Ib.) 385

3. An entry was made in the land-office of Kentucky, of one thousand acres, in the name of "John Floyd's heirs," without naming the persons who were the heirs. Upon an objection to the validity of the entry, the court said: That substituting a legal description, which cannot be misunderstood, for the more definite description by the proper names of the persons who are the heirs, was not of such substantial importance as to vitiate the transaction.

Hunt v. Wickliffe, (208) 400

4. An entry was made "so as to join the settlements on the north-east and south sides thereof, so as to run into the old military surveys which are legal." The old military surveys formed together a parallelogram, and adjoined the lands intended to be described by the entry. It was objected that the limitation on the entry, "so as not to run into the old surveys which are legal," rendered the whole entry so uncertain as to make it void.

Id. (Ib.) 400

5. The rules, which are settled in Kentucky, would require that this entry, had the restriction respecting the military surveys been omitted, should be surveyed equally on the north-east and south side of the settlement, the whole land to be included by rectangular lines. The old military survey must, therefore, be so contiguous to the settlement as to stop one or two of those lines. A subsequent locator knows where to look for them, and the testimony in the cause informs us that he would encounter no difficulty in finding them. "We consider the last words 'which are legal,' merely as an affirmation that they are so, not as leaving it doubtful; and consequently that they make no change in the entry."

Id. (209) 400

6. It is well settled, both in the court of Kentucky and in this court, that a possession which will bar an ejectment, is also a bar in equity.

Id. (212) 401

7. Each of the parties held in possession, distinct parts of the land in controversy. In this state of things it is well settled, that the party having the better right, is in constructive possession of all the land not occupied, in fact, by his adversary.

Id. (Ib.) 401

8. Undoubtedly, the presumption is in favor of the validity of every grant issued in the forms prescribed by law; and it is incumbent on him who controverts it to support his objections. The whole burthen of proof lies on him. But if his objections depend on facts, those facts must be submitted to a jury. If opposing testimony be produced, that testimony, also, must be laid before the jury; and the court may declare the law upon the fact, but cannot declare it on the testimony.

Patterson's Lessee v. Jenks, (227) 406

9. In the nature of things, we perceive no reason why the grant of the land in controversy should be good for land which it might lawfully pass; and void as to that part of the tract for the granting of which the office had not been open. It is every day's practice to make grants, for lands which have in part been granted to others. It has never been suggested that the whole grant is void because a part of the land was not grantable.

Id. (235) 409

10. The principle, that a patent conveying lands lying partly within, and partly without the territory retained by the Indians, was void as to so much as lay within it, and valid for the residue, was settled by this court in the case of Danforth v. Wear, (9 Wheaton, 673). This decision was made on a patent depending on the statutes of North Carolina, which contain prohibitions at least as strong as those of Georgia.

Id. (236) 409

11. Under the statute of limitations of Tennessee, of seventeen hundred and ninety-seven, a possession of seven years is a protection only when held under a grant, or under valid mesne conveyances, or a paper title, which are legally or equitably connected with a grant; and a void deed is not such a conveyance as that a possession under it will be protected by the statute of limitations.

Lessee of Powell v. Harman, (241) 411

12. See Louisiana.

13. The lands north-west of the River Ohio, between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, lying west of Ludlow's line, east of Roberts's line and south of the Indian boundary, reserved by Virginia, in her deed of cession to the United States of March, 1784, for the satisfaction of the military bounties Virginia had promised, were not, prior to 1810, by any legislative Acts of the government of the United States, withdrawn from appropriation under and by virtue of Virginia military land warrants. A patent issued on the 12th of October, 1812, founded upon a military land warrant, for land within the reserved lands, is valid against a claimant of the same land, holding under a sale made by the United States.

Reynolds v. M'Arthur, (417) 470

14. Proceedings for the sale of the real estate of an intestate, for the payment of debts, were commenced before the repeal of the Act of the Legislature of Ohio, entitled "A law for the settlement of intestates' estates." The administrators, notwithstanding the repeal, went on to sell the land, and appropriate the proceeds to the discharge of the debt to the intestate. Held, that the sale was void.

The Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley's heirs, (492) 496

LANDS AND LAND TITLES—3.

1. It is an obvious principle that a grant must describe the land to be conveyed, and that the subject granted must be identified by the description given of it in the instrument itself. The description of the land consists of the courses and distances run by the surveyor, and of the marked trees at the lines and corners, or other natural objects which ascertain the very land which was actually surveyed.

Chinoweth et al. v. The Lessee of Haskell, (96) 616

2. If a grant be made which describes the land granted by course and distance only, or by natural objects not distinguishable from others of the same kind, course and distance, though not safe guides, are the only guides given and must be used.

Id. (Ib.) 616

3. The line which forms the western boundary of the land intended to be granted was never run or marked. In his office the surveyor assumed a course and distance, and terminated the line at two small chestnut oaks. But where are we to look for those two small chestnut oaks in a wilderness in which one man takes up fifty thousand acres and another one hundred thousand? or how are we to distinguish them from other chestnut oaks? The guide, and the only guide given us by the surveyor or by the grant, is the course and distance.

Id. (Ib.) 616

4. It is admitted that the course and distance called for in a grant may be controlled and corrected by other objects of description which show that the survey actually covered other ground than the lines of the grant would comprehend.

Id. (98) 616

5. On a trial in ejectment for lands in Virginia, the plaintiffs offered in evidence a number of entries of recent date, made by the defendants, within the bounds of the tract of land in dispute, designated as "Young's four thousand acres;" and attempted to prove, by a witness, that Young, when he made the entries, had heard of the plaintiffs' claim to the land. The defendants then offered to introduce, as evidence, official copies of entries made by other and third persons since the date of the plaintiffs' grant, for the purpose of proving a general opinion that the lands contained in the plaintiffs' survey made under the order of the court after the commencement of the suit, were vacant at the date of such entries; and to disprove notice to him of the identity of plaintiff's claim

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

when he made the entries under which he claimed. This evidence was unquestionably irrelevant.

Stringer et al. v. The Lessee of Young. (337) 699

6. Entries made subsequent to the plaintiffs' claim, whatever might have been the impression under which they were made, could not possibly affect the title held under a prior entry.

Id. (Ib.) 699

7. The land law of Virginia directs that, within three months after a survey is made the surveyor shall enter the plat and certificate thereof in a book, well bound, to be provided by the court of his county at the county charge. After prescribing this, among other duties, the law proceeds to enact that any surveyor failing in the duties aforesaid, shall be liable to be indicted. The law, however, does not declare that the validity of such survey shall depend in any degree on its being recorded.

Id. (338) 699

8. The chief surveyor appoints deputies at his will, and no mode of appointment is prescribed. The survey made by his deputy is examined and adopted by himself, and is certified by himself, to the register of the land-office. He recognizes the actual surveyor as his deputy in that particular transaction, and this, if it be unusual or irregular, cannot affect the grant.

Id. (340) 699

9. Objections, which are properly overruled when urged against a legal title in support of an equity, dependent entirely on a survey of land for which a patent had been issued, can have no weight when urged against a patent regularly issued in all the forms of law.

Id. (340) 699

10. In Virginia the patent is the completion of the title, and establishes the performance of every prerequisite. No inquiry into the regularity of these preliminary measures, which ought to precede it, is made in a trial at law. No case has shown that it may be impeached at law, unless it be for fraud—not legal and technical, but actual and positive fraud, in fact, committed by the person who obtained it; and even this is questioned.

Id. (Ib.) 699

11. It is admitted to have been indispensably necessary to the plaintiffs' action to show a valid title to the land in controversy, and that the defendants were at liberty to resist the testimony by any evidence tending in any degree to disprove this identity. But the defendants were not at liberty to offer evidence having no such tendency, but which might either effect a different purpose, or be wholly irrelevant. The question of its relevancy must be decided by the court; and any error in its judgment would be corrected by an appellate tribunal. The court cannot perceive that the omission of the surveyor to record the survey, or the fact that the survey was made by a person not a regular deputy, had any tendency to prove that the land described in the patent was not the land for which the suit was instituted.

Id. (342) 700

12. The warrant for the land in controversy was entered with the surveyor of Monongalia County on the 7th of April, 1784. At the May session of that year, the General Assembly of Virginia divided the County of Monongalia, and erected a new county, to take effect in July, by the name of Harrison. The land on which the plaintiffs' warrant was entered, lay in the new county. The certificate of survey is dated in December, 1784, and in accordance with the entry, states the land to be in Monongalia. The land law of Virginia enacts that warrants shall be lodged with the surveyor of the county in which the lands lie, and that the party shall direct the location specially and precisely. It also directs despatch in the survey of all lands entered in the office. No provision is made for the division of a county between the entry and the survey. The act establishing the county of Harrison, does not direct that the surveyor of Monongalia County shall furnish the surveyor of Harrison with copies of the entries of lands which lay in the new county, and with the warrants on which they were made. In this state of things the survey of the land in controversy was made by the surveyor of Monongalia; the plat and certificate on which the patent was afterwards issued were transmitted to the land-office, and the patent described the land as in Monongalia County. No change was made in the law until 1788. This will not annul the patent, or deprive the unoffending patentee of his property.

LANDS AND LAND TITLES—4.

1. The defendant claimed land in controversy under a tax sale, which was made by a company incorporated by the Legislature of Connecticut in 1796, called "the proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie," and incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Ohio passed on the 15th of April, 1803, by the name of "the proprietors of the half million of acres of land lying south of Lake Erie, called the sufferers' land." In 1806 the Legislature of Ohio imposed a land tax, and authorized the sale of the lands in the State for unpaid taxes, giving to the owners the right to redeem within one year after the determination of their minority. The act was in force in 1808. In 1808 the directors of the company, incorporated by the Legislatures of Connecticut and Ohio, assessed two cents per acre on the lands of the company for the payment of the tax laid by the State of Ohio, and authorized the sale of those lands on which the assessments were not paid. The lands purchased by the defendant were the property of minors at the time of the sale; they having been sold to pay the said assessments under the authority of the directors of the company. Held, that the sale of the land under which the defendant claimed was void. That a corporation is strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are specifically conferred on it, will not be denied. The exercise of the corporate franchise, being restrictive of individual rights, cannot be extended beyond the letter and spirit of the Act of Incorporation. From a careful inspection of the whole act, it clearly appears that the incorporation of the company was designed to enable the proprietors to accomplish specific objects, and that no more power was given than was considered necessary to attain these objects. The words, "all necessary expenses of the company," cannot be so construed to enlarge the power to tax, which is given for specific purposes. A tax by the State is not a necessary expense of the company within the meaning of the act. Such an expense can only result from the action of the company in the exercise of its corporate powers. The provision in the tenth section, "that the directors shall have power to do whatever shall appear to them to be necessary and proper to be done for the well ordering of the interests of the proprietors, not contrary to the laws of the State," was not intended to give unlimited power, but the exercise of a discretion within the scope of the authority conferred.

Beatty v. The Lessee of Knowler. (152) 813

2. It is a fact of general notoriety that the surveys and patents for lands within the Virginia military district, contain a greater quantity of land than is specified in the grants. Parties, when entering into a contract for the purchase of a tract of land in that district, and referring to the patent for a description, of course expect that the quantity would exceed the specific number of acres. But so large an excess as in the present case can hardly be presumed to have been within the expectation of either party. And admitting that a strict legal interpretation of a contract would entitle the purchaser to the surplus, whatever it might be, it by no means follows that a court of chancery will in all cases lend its aid to enforce a specific performance of such a contract.

King et al. v. Hamilton. (311) 869

3. If this large surplus of eight hundred and seventy-six acres in a patent for one thousand five hundred and thirty-three and one-third acres should be taken as included in the original purchase, it might well be considered a case of gross inadequacy of price.

Id. (Ib.) 869

4. When there was so great a surplus of land in the patent beyond that which is called for nominally, as that it could hardly be presumed to have been within the view of either of the parties to the contract of sale; the court decreed a conveyance of the surplus, the vendee to pay for the same at the average rate per acre, with interest, which the consideration money mentioned in the contract bore to the quantity of land named in the same.

Id. (Ib.) 869

5. The possession of a warrant has always been considered at the land-office in Ohio sufficient authority to make locations under it. Letters of attorney were seldom if ever given to locators, because they were deemed unnecessary.

Galt et al. v. Gallway, (232) 876

6. An entry could only be made in the name of the person to whom the warrant was issued or assigned; so that the locator could acquire no title in his own name, except by a regular assignment.

Id. (Ib.) 876

7. When an entry is surveyed, its boundaries are designated, and nothing can be more reasonable and just than that these shall limit the claim of the locator. To permit him to vary his lines, so as to affect injuriously the rights of others subsequently acquired, would be manifestly in opposition to every principle of justice.

Id. (Ib.) 876

8. Since locations were made in the Virginia military district in Ohio, it has been the practice of locators, at pleasure, to withdraw their warrants, both before and after surveys were executed. This practice is shown by the records of the land-office, and is known to all who are conversant with these titles. The withdrawal is always entered on the margin of the original entry, as a notice to subsequent locators; and no reason is necessary to be alleged as a justification of the act. If the first entry be defective in its calls, or if a more advantageous location can be made, the entry is generally withdrawn. This change cannot be made to the injury of the rights of others; and the public interest is not affected by it. The land from which the warrant is withdrawn is left vacant for subsequent locators; and the warrant is laid elsewhere, on the same number of unimproved lands.

Id. (Ib.) 876

9. As the records of the land-office are of great importance to the country, and are kept under the official sanction of the government, their contents must always be considered, and they are always received in courts of justice, as evidence of the facts stated.

Id. (Ib.) 876

10. Under the peculiar system of the Virginia land law, as it has been settled in Kentucky and in the Virginia military district in Ohio by usages adapted to the circumstances of the country, many principles have been established which are unknown to the common law. A long course of adjudications has fixed these principles, and they are considered as the settled rules by which these military titles are to be governed.

Id. (Ib.) 876

11. An entry, or the withdrawal of an entry, is in fact made by the principal surveyor at the instance of the person who controls the warrant. It is not to be presumed that this officer would place upon his records any statement which affected the rights of others, at the instance of an individual who had no authority to act in the case. The facts, therefore, proved by the records, must be received as prima facie evidence of the right of the person at whose instance they were recorded; and as conclusive in regard to such things as the law requires to be recorded.

Id. (Ib.) 876

12. A location made in the name of a deceased person is void; as every other act done in the name of a deceased person must be considered.

Id. (Ib.) 876

13. The withdrawal of an entry is liable to objection, subject to the rights which others may have acquired subsequent to its withdrawal having been entered in the land-office. This is required by principles of justice as well as of law.

Id. (Ib.) 876

14. Where by a royal charter of a town in Vermont lauds were given to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the society being named as grantees of one share in the town, the court held that this was a plain recognition by the crown of the existence of the corporation and of its capacity to take lands. Such a recognition would confer the power to take land, if it had not previously existed.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. The Town of Pawlet, &c., (480) 927

15. H. entered with the proper surveyor for the District of Kentucky, forty-five thousand acres of land, in the County of Washington in that State, by virtue of treasury warrants. A survey was made thereon in 1786, and a patent for the land issued to H. in 1797. The warrants were purchased by the ancestor of the complainant, by a parol agreement with H. previous to their entry. Before this agreement H., in connection with a person who owned other warrants, had made an agreement with S. to locate their respective warrants, which agreement was ratified by the complainant, who paid a sum of money to S. for fees of patenting, and agreed to make S. a liberal compensation for his services; and S. located and surveyed under the warrants forty-five thousand acres, returned the surveys to the office, and paid the fees of office. The locating and surveying of the warrants, and all the necessary steps for completing the title were done by S., who was employed first by H., and afterwards by the complainant, who paid in money for the same. H. being deceased, and having made no conveyance of the legal title to the lands, the complainant filed a bill in the County of Washington, "against the unknown heirs of H.," and in 1815 a decree was made by that court for a conveyance of the lands by the unknown heirs, or in their default by a commissioner appointed in the decree to make the same. Held, that the conveyance was not authorized by the laws of Kentucky in force at the time of the decree.

Hollingsworth v. Barbour et al., (465) 922

16. The claim of "a locator" is peculiar to Kentucky, and has been universally understood by the people of the country to signify that compensation of a portion of the land located, agreed to be given by the owner of the warrant, to the locator of it for his services.

Id. (Ib.) 922

17. The term "property," when applied to lands, comprehends every species of title inchoate or complete. It is supposed to embrace those rights which lie in contact; those which are executory, as well as those which are executed.

3. The case of Thelusson v. Smith (2 Wheat., 396) turned upon its own particular circumstances. And it establishes no such proposition as that a specific and perfected lien can be displaced by the mere priority of the United States.

Id. (444) 214

4. It is not understood that a general lien, by judgment on lands, constitutes, per se, a property or right in the land itself. It only confers a right to levy on the same, to the exclusion of other adverse interests, subsequent to the judgment; and when the levy is actually made on the same, the title of the creditor relates back to the time of the judgment, so as to cut out immediate incumbrances. But subject to this, the debtor has full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the land.

LIEN OF THE UNITED STATES FOR DUTIES—3.

1. The United States have no general lien on merchandise, the property of the importer, for duties due by him upon other importations. The only effect of the first provision in the sixty-second section of the Act of 1799, ch. 128, is that the delinquent debtor is denied at the custom-house any further credit for duties until his unsatisfied bonds are paid. He is compellable to pay the duties in cash, and upon such payment he is entitled to the delivery of the goods imported. The manifest intention of the remaining clause in the section, is to compel the original consignee to enter the goods imported by him.

Harris v. Dennie, (302) 687

2. No person but the owner or original consignee, or in his absence or sickness, his agent or factor, is entitled to enter the goods at the custom-house, or give bond for the duties, or to pay the duties. Upon the entry the original invoices are to be produced and sworn to, and the whole objects of the act would be defeated by allowing a mere stranger to make the entry, or take the oath prescribed on the entry.

Id. (304) 687

3. The United States having a lien on goods imported for the payment of the duties accruing on them, and which have not been secured by bond, and being entitled to the custody of them from the time of their arrival in port until the duties are paid or secured; any attachment by a State officer is an interference with such lien and right to custody, and, being repugnant to the laws of the United States, is void.

Id. (305) 688

4. The acknowledgment by the custom-house store-keeper that he holds goods upon which the duties have not been secured or paid, subject to an attachment issued out of a State court at the suit of a creditor of the importer, was a plain departure from his duty, and is not authorized by the law of the United States, and cannot be admitted to vary the rights of the parties.

LIMITATION OF ACTION—3.

1. B., a Deputy Commissary-General of the United States received from M., a Deputy Quartermaster-General of the United States, the sum of $10,000, and acknowledged the same by a receipt signed by him with his official description. The United States had a right to treat M. as their agent in the transaction, by making B. their debtor, and to an action brought against him for money had and received, the statute of limitations is no bar.

The United States v. Buford, (29) 591

2. Where, before the transfer to the United States of an instrument which was the evidence of debt the term of five years had elapsed, the period after which the statute of limitations was a bar, it can require no argument to show that the transfer of such claim to the United States cannot give it greater validity than it possessed before the transfer.

Id. (30) 591

3. If no length of time would protect a possession originally acquired under a lease, it would be productive of evils truly alarming, and we must be convinced beyond a doubt that the law is so settled before we would give our sanction to such a doctrine, and this is not the case upon authorities.

Willson v. Watkins, (51) 599

4. In no instance has the principle of law which protects the relations between landlord and tenant been carried so far as in this case, which presents a disclaimer by a tenant with the knowledge of his landlord, and an unbroken possession afterwards for such a length of time, that the act of limitations has run out four times before he has done any act to assert his right to the land.

Id. (48) 598

5. The plaintiff sued the defendant, as register of the United States land-office in Ohio, for damages, for having refused to note on his books applications made by him for the purchase of land within his district. The declaration charged the register with this refusal, the lands had never been applied for nor sold, and were at the time of the application liable to be so applied for and sold. The statute of limitations is a good plea to the suit.

McCluny v. Silliman, (276) 678

6. It is a well-settled principle that a statute of limitations is the law of the forum, and operates upon all who submit themselves to its jurisdiction.

Id. (Ib.) 678

7. Under the thirty-fourth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, the acts of limitations of the several States where no special provision has been made by Congress, form a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, and the same effect is given to them as is given in the State courts.

9. Where the statute of limitations is not restricted to particular causes of action, but provides that the action, by its technical denomination, shall be barred if not brought within a limited time, every cause for which such action may be prosecuted is within the statute.

Id. (Ib.) 678

10. In giving a construction to the statute of limitations of Ohio, the action being barred by its denomination, the court cannot look into the cause of action. They may do this in those cases where actions are barred for causes specified in the statute; for the statute only operates against such actions when prosecuted on the grounds stated.

Id. (Ib.) 678

11. Of late years the courts in England and in this country have considered statutes of limitations more favorably than formerly. They rest upon sound policy, and tend to the peace and welfare of society. The courts do not now, unless compelled by the force of former decisions, give a strained construction, to evade the effect of those statutes. By requiring those who complain of injuries to seek redress by action at law within a reasonable time, a salutary vigilance is imposed and an end is put to litigation.

Id. (Ib.) 678

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—4.

1. A promissory note was, by the plaintiff, placed in the hands of P. for collection. He instituted a suit in the State court thereon against the drawer on the 7th of May, 1820, but neglected to do so against the indorser. The drawer proved insolvent. On the 8th of February, 1821, he sued the indorser, but committed a fatal mistake by a misnomer of the plaintiffs; upon which, after passing through the successive courts of the State, a judgment of nonsuit was finally rendered against the plaintiffs. Before that time, the action against the indorser was barred by the statute of limitation, to wit, on the 9th of November, 1822. This suit was instituted on the 27th of January, 1825. The statute of limitations of North Carolina interposes a bar to actions of assumpsit after three years.

Wilcox et al. v. The Executors of Plummer, (172) 821

2. The questions in the case were, whether the statute of limitations commenced running, when the error was committed in the commencement of the action against the indorser; or whether it commenced from the time the actual damage was sustained by the plaintiffs by the judgment of nonsuit; whether the statute runs from the time the action accrued, or from the time that the damage was developed, or became definite. Held, that the statute began to run from the time of committing the error, by the misnomer in the action against the indorser.

Id. (Ib.) 821

3. The ground of action in the case is a contract to act diligently and skillfully; and both the contract and the breach of it admit of a definite assignment of date. When might this action have been brought, is the question; for from that time the statute must run.

Id. (Ib.) 821

4. When the attorney was chargeable with negligence or unskillfulness, his contract was violated, and the action might have been sustained immediately. Perhaps in that event, no more than nominal damages may be proved, and no more recovered; but, on the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the proof of actual damage may extend to facts that occur and grow out of the injury, even up to the day of the verdict. If so, it is clear that the damage is not the cause of the action.

Id. (Ib.) 821

5. The statutes of limitation of Vermont interpose no bar to the institution by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, &c., of an action for the recovery of land granted by the charter of the town of Pawlet.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, &c., v. The Town of Pawlet, &c., (480) 927

6. The act of the Legislature of Vermont which prohibits the recovery of mesne profits in certain cases, applies to the claims to such profits by the plaintiffs in this suit; and the provisions of the Treaty of Peace of 1783, and those of the Treaty with Great Britain in 1794, do not interfere with the provisions of that act. The law has prescribed the restrictions under which mesne profits shall be recovered; and these restrictions are obligatory on the citizens of the State. The plaintiffs take the benefit of the statute remedy to recover their right to the land; and they must take the remedy with all the statute restrictions.

LOUISIANA—2.

1. By the treaty of St. Ildefonso, made on the 1st of October, 1800, Spain ceded Louisiana to France; and France, by the treaty of Paris, signed the 30th of April, 1803, ceded it to the United States. Under this treaty the United States claimed the countries between the Iberville and the Perdido. Spain contended that her cession to France comprehended only that territory which at the time of the cession was denominated Louisiana, consisting of the island of New Orleans, and the country which had been originally ceded to her by France, west of the Mississippi. The land claimed by the plaintiffs in error, under a grant from the crown of Spain, made after the treaty of St. Ildefonso, lies within the disputed territory; and this case presents the question, to whom did the country between the Iberville and Perdido belong after the treaty of St. Ildefonso? Had France and Spain agreed upon the boundaries of the retroceded territory, before Louisiana was acquired by the United States, that agreement would undoubtedly have ascertained its limits. But the declarations of France, made after parting with the Province, cannot be admitted as conclusive. In questions of this charter, political considerations have too much influence over the conduct of nations, to permit their declarations to decide the course of an independent government, in a matter vitally interesting to itself.

Foster et al. v. Neilson, (306) 433

2. If a Spanish grantee had obtained possession of the land in dispute so as to be the defendant, would a court of the United States maintain his title under a Spanish grant, made subsequent to the acquisition of Louisiana, singly on the principle that the Spanish construction of the treaty of St. Ildefonso was right, and the American construction wrong? Such a decision would subvert those principles which govern the relations between the Legislature and judicial departments, and mark the limits of each.

Id. (309) 434

3. The sound construction of the 8th article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, of the 22d of February, 1829, will not enable the court to apply its provisions to the case of the plaintiff.

Id. (314) 435

4. The article does not declare that all the grants made by His Catholic Majesty before the 24th of January, 1818, shall be valid to the same extent as if the ceded territories had remained under his dominion. It does not say that those grants are hereby confirmed. Had such been its language, it would have acted directly on the subject, and it would have repealed those acts of Congress which were repugnant to it; but its language is that those grants shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession, &c. By whom shall they be ratified and confirmed? This seems to be the language of contract; and if it is, the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be the act of the Legislature. Until such act shall be passed, the court is not at liberty to disregard the existing laws on the subject.

Id. (Ib.) 435

LOUISIANA—4.

1. By the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, the United States stipulated that the inhabitants of the ceded territories should be protected in the free enjoyment of their property. The United States as a just nation regard this stipulation as the avowal of a principle which would have been held equally sacred, although it had not been inserted in the treaty.

Soulard et al. v. The United States, (511) 938

2. The term "property," as applied to lands, comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete. It is supposed to embrace those rights which lie in contract; those which are executory, as well as those which are executed. In this respect the relations of the inhabitants of Louisiana to their government is not changed. The new government takes the place of that which has passed away.

MANDAMUS—1.

The court refused to issue a mandamus to the Circuit Court for the County of Washington, commanding that court to strike off a plea which the court had permitted the defendant to put in, and to compel the defendant to enter another plea, which the plaintiffs' counsel deemed the proper plea, under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of Maryland, upon which the proceedings were founded incorporating the Bank of Columbia.

Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, (567) 265

MARRIAGE—1.

By the laws of Maryland, a feme covert who has been abandoned by her husband, is not permitted to marry a second time, until her husband shall have been absent seven years, and shall not have been heard of during that time.

Rhea et al. v. Rhenner, (108) 73

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT—2

1. A marriage settlement provided that the trustees, after the death of the husband, should stand possessed of a bond executed to them by the husband, and of the sum of $37,038 to be received by them; upon trust to place out the same when it shall come into their hands, at interest, on freehold securities, or invest it, or any part of it, in the purchase of stock of the United States of North America, or bank stock there, with the approbation of the wife; and to call in and replace the same, and reinvest the same and the produce thereof, from time to time, upon or in such securities, or stock, with the approbation of the wife.

English et al. v. Forall, (595) 531

2. It is not an unreasonable interpretation to say, that the wife, who survived the husband, was to have a controlling agency, within the limitation prescribed by the contract. She has not an arbitrary and unlimited discretion. The investment is restricted to three objects: freehold securities, United States stock, or bank stock; and the trustees are not authorized to make any other investment. The trustees are bound to make the investment in any one of the funds mentioned, which the wife might request or direct.

Id. (609) 536

3. The husband by his will confirmed the marriage settlement, and he further declared, "that if the sum of $37,038 secured to be paid to the trustees should at any time be found insufficient to raise and bring into the hands of the trustees the clear annual sum of $2,222.22, the annuity secured to be paid to his wife by the settlement, then the trustees of his will shall, from time to time, transfer to themselves, as trustees of the settlement, out of the residuum of his estate, such sum or sums of money as may, from time to time, be found necessary to make up any deficiency there may happen to be between the current amount of the interest and produce of the principal sum, and the amount of the annuity; so that, in no event, less than $2,222.22 shall be raised annually for his wife, or for her benefit in the United States.

Id. (610) 537

4. The personal estate of the husband, exclusive of the sum placed in the hands of the trustees of the annuity, was so invested as to produce six per centum per annum, and the direction of the wife to keep invested in six per cent. stock of the United States the $37,038, produced a deficiency in the annuity, which she claimed to have made up from the residuary estate. The wife has a right to claim this deficiency to be so made up.

MECHANICS' BANK OF ALEXANDRIA—1.

1. The provision in the act of Congress incorporating "The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria," which requires that the capital stock of the bank shall consist of 50,000 shares of ten dollars each, is not a condition precedent; and the bank went legally into operation, with an actual capital less than that number of shares.

Minor v. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, (65) 55

2. Even if fraud had existed in the original subscription of this stock of the bank, it would be extremely difficult to maintain that such a fraud, which was private between the original subscribers to the stock and the commissioners, could be set up to the injury of subsequent purchasers of the stock, who became bona fide holders of the same, without participation in or notice thereof.

Id. (1b.) 55

3. It is not a correct construction of the 3d and 21st sections of the Act of Congress, incorporating the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, that the stock of the bank shall be deemed to belong to the persons in whose names it stands upon the books of the bank, and that the bank is not bound to recognize the interests of any cestui que trust, and may refuse to permit the stock to be transferred whilst the nominal holder is indebted to the bank.

The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Louisa and Maria Seton, (308) 156

MESNE PROFITS—4.

1. The Act of the Legislature of New York of May 1, 1786, gave to the purchasers of forfeited estates the like remedy in case of eviction for obtaining compensation for the value of their improvements as is directed in the Act of the 12th of May, 1784. The latter act declares that the person or persons having obtained judgment against such purchasers, shall not have any writ of possession, nor obtain possession of such lands, &c., until he shall have paid to the purchaser of such lands or person holding title under him, the value of all improvements made thereon after the passing of the act. Held, that claims of compensation for improvements made under the authority of these acts of the Legislature of New York are inconsistent with the provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain of 1783, and should be rejected.

Carver v. Astor, (1) 761

2. That in all cases a party is bound by natural justice to pay for improvements on land, made against his will or without his consent, is a proposition which the court are not prepared to admit.

Id. (101) 796

3. The act of the Legislature of Vermont which prohibits the recovery of mesne profits in certain cases, applies to the claims to such profits by the plaintiffs in this suit; and the provisions of the Treaty of Peace of 1783, and those of the treaty with Great Britain in 1794, do not interfere with the provisions of that act. The law has prescribed the restrictions under which mesne profits shall be recovered; and these restrictions are obligatory on the citizens of the State. The plaintiffs take the benefit of the statute remedy to recover their right to the land; and they must take the remedy with all the statute restrictions.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, &c., v. The Town of Pawlet, &c., (480) 927

MISNOMER—3.

1. A commission issued in the name of Richard M. Meade, the name of the plaintiff being Richard W. Meade. This is a clerical error in making out the commission, and does not affect its execution.

Keene v. Meade, (6) 583

2. It may well be questioned whether the middle letter of a name forms any part of the Christian name of a party. It is said the law knows only of one Christian name, and there are adjudged cases strongly countenancing, if not fully establishing, that the entire omission of a middle letter is not a misnomer or variance.

Id. (7) 583

3. The misnomer of a county, in a patent for land will not vacate the patent. It will admit of explanation, and if explanation can be received, the patent in which the misnomer is found is not absolutely void.

Lessee of Stringer v. Lessee of Young (344) 701

MISTAKE—1.

See Equity, 6, 8.

MORTGAGE—1.

It is true, that in discussions in courts of equity, a mortgage is sometimes called a lien for a debt; and so it certainly is, and something more; it is a transfer of the property itself as security for the debt. This must be admitted to be true at law, and it is equally true in equity, for in this respect equity follows the law. The estate is considered as a trust, and according to the intention of the parties, as a qualified estate and security; where the debt is discharged there is a resulting trust for the mortgagee. It is, therefore, only in a loose and general sense that it is sometimes called a lien; and then only by way of contrast to an estate absolute and indefeasible.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (441) 213

NATURALIZATION—4.

1. The second section of the Act of Congress "to establish a uniform system of naturalization," passed in 1802, requires that every person desirous of being naturalized shall make report of himself to the clerk of the District Court of the district where he shall arrive, or some other court of record in the United States; which report is to be recorded, and a certificate of the same given to such alien; and "which certificate shall be exhibited to the court by every alien who may arrive in the United States after the passing of the act, on his application to be naturalized, as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States." James Spratt arrived in the United States after the passing of this act, and was under the obligation to report himself according to its provisions. The law does not require that the report shall have been made five years before the application for naturalization. The third condition of the first section of the law, which declares that the court admitting an alien to become a citizen "shall be satisfied that he has resided five years in the United States," &c., does not prescribe the evidence which shall be satisfactory. The report is required by the law to be exhibited on the application for naturalization as evidence of the time of arrival in the United States. The law does not say the report shall be the sole evidence, nor does it require that the alien shall report himself within any limited time after arrival. Five years may intervene between the time of arrival and the report, and yet the report be valid. The report is undoubtedly conclusive evidence of the arrival; but it is not made by the law the only evidence of that fact.

Spratt v. Spratt, (393) 897

2. James Spratt was admitted a citizen of the United States by the Circuit Court for the County of Washington in the District of Columbia, and obtained a certificate of the same in the usual form. The act of the court admitting James Spratt as a citizen was a judgment of the Circuit Court, and this court cannot look behind it and inquire on what testimony it was pronounced.

Id. (406) 902

3. The various acts on the subject of naturalization, submit the decision upon the right of aliens to courts of record. They are to receive testimony to compare it with the law, and to judge on both law and fact. If their judgment is entered on record in legal form, it closes all inquiry; and, like any other judgment, is complete evidence of its own validity.

Id. (408) 902

NEW TRIAL—1.

An application for a new trial, on motion after verdict, addresses itself to the sound discretion of the court; and if, upon the whole case, the verdict is substantially right, no new trial will be granted, although there may have been some mistakes committed on the trial. The application is not a matter of absolute right, but rests in the judgment of the court, and is to be granted only in furtherance of justice. On a writ of error, bringing the proceedings on the trial, by bill of exceptions, to the cognizance of the Appellate Court, the directions of the court below must then stand or fall, upon their own intrinsic propriety, as matters of law.

McLanahan v. The Universal Insurance Company, (183) 104

NOLLE PROSEQUI—1.

1. According to modern decisions, a nolle prosequi does not amount to a retraxit, but simply to an agreement not to proceed further in that suit, as to the particular person or cause of action to which it was applied.

Minor et al. v. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, (74) 59

2. In an action on a joint and several bond, some of the parties, sureties, severed in their pleadings from the principal, and a trial and verdict were had against them; afterwards the principal was called upon to plead, and he did so; judgment was then entered against the sureties, and a nolle prosequi entered against the principal. To this judgment, or the proceedings, no exception was taken in the court below, nor was a new trial asked by the sureties. The court held, that there is no decision exactly in point to the case; that there is no distinction between the entry of a nolle prosequi, before, and the entry after judgment, as applicable to this case. The decisions of the courts of the United States upon this proceeding, have been on the ground that the question is matter of practice and convenience.

Id. (75) 59

3. When the defendants sever in their pleadings, a nolle prosequi ought to be allowed against one defendant. It is a practice which violates no rules of pleading, and will subserve the public convenience. In the administration of justice, matters of form, not absolutely subjected to authority, may well yield to the substantial purposes of justice.

Id. (80) 62

NONSUIT—1.

1. The courts of the United States have no authority to order a peremptory nonsuit, against the will of the plaintiff, on the trial of a cause before a jury. The plaintiff might agree to a nonsuit, but if he do not so choose, the court cannot compel him to submit to it.

Elmore v. Grymes, (471) 225

2. A nonsuit may not be ordered by the court in any case, without the consent and acquiescence of the plaintiff.

D'Wolf v. Rabaud et al., (497) 236

OFFICIAL BONDS—1.

1. The condition of an official bond, that the officer who gives it shall "well and truly" execute the duties of his office, includes not only honesty, but reasonable skill and diligence. If the duties are performed negligently and unskillfully, if they are violated from want of capacity or want of care, they can never be said to have been "well and truly executed."

Minor et al. v. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, (69) 57

2. No act or vote of the Board of Directors of a bank, in violation of their own duties, and in fraud of the rights and interests of the stockholders or the bank, will justify the cashier of the bank in acts which are in violation of the stipulation in his official bond, "well and truly" to execute the duties of his office. Acts done by a cashier, under the authority of such a vote, or of a usage permitted by the directors in violation of the trusts assumed by them, are on the responsibility of the cashier and of his sureties.

Id. (71) 58

3. The official bond of the cashier must be construed to cover all defaults in duty, which are annexed to the office, from time, by those who are authorized to control the affairs of the bank; and the sureties in the bond are presumed to enter into a contract, with reference to the rights and authorities of the president and directors, under the charter and by-laws.

Id. (73) 58

4. The claim of the United States upon an official bond and upon all parties thereto, is not released by the laches of the officer to whom the assertion of this claim is intrusted by law. Such laches have no effect whatsoever on the rights of the United States, as well against the sureties as the principal in the bond.

Doe v. The Postmaster-General, (325) 163

PAROL EVIDENCE—1.

The court held, that parol evidence was admissible, to show the agreement relative to the place where payment of a note was to be demanded, although the agreement did not appear on the face of the note. Such an agreement is a circumstance extrinsic to the contract made by the note, and its proof by parol is regular.

Brent's Executors v. The Bank of the Metropolis, (92) 67

PARTIES—1.

1. See Chancery practice, 3, 9, 12, 13.

2. The affidavit of a party to the cause of the loss or destruction of an original paper, offered in order to introduce secondary evidence of the contents of the paper, is proper. If such affidavit could not be received of the loss of a written contract, the contents of which are well known to others, or a copy of which can be proved, a party might be completely deprived of his rights, at least in a court of law.

Taylor v. Riggs, (596) 277

3. It is a sound general rule, that a party cannot be a witness in his own cause; but many collateral questions arise in the progress of a cause, to which the rule does not apply. Questions which do not involve the matter in controversy, but matter which is auxiliary to the trial, and which facilitates the preparation for it, often depends on the oath of the party. An affidavit of the materiality of a witness for the purpose of obtaining a continuance or a commission to take depositions, or an affidavit of his inability to attend, is usually made by the party, and received without objection. On incidental questions, which do not affect the issue to be tried by the jury, the affidavit of the party is received.

Id. (1b.) 277

PARTIES—2.

When there is no change of the parties to a suit, during its progress, a jurisdiction depending on the condition of the parties is governed by that condition as it was at the commencement of the suit.

Conolly v. Taylor, (565) 521

PARTNER AND PARTNERSHIP—1.

1. One partner, during the continuance of the partnership, cannot bind the other partner to a submission of the interests of both, to arbitration; but he might bind himself, so as to submit his own interests to such decision.

Karthauss v. Ferrer et al., (223) 123

2. See Pleas and Pleadings, 14.

PARTNER AND PARTNERSHIP—2.

1. Third persons are not bound to inquire whether the partner with whom they are contracting is acting on the partnership account, or for his individual advantage. The interest of the partner in the joint stock of the concern, and his consequent authority to use the partnership name, raises a presumption that the contract was made for joint account; which is sufficient to bind the firm, unless to the contrary be shown; and that the person with whom the partner deals had notice, or reason to believe that the former was acting on his separate account.

Le Roy v. Johnson, (198) 396

2. Where in the articles of partnership no name of the firm was mentioned as agreed upon, and the concern went into operation under the articles, the books being kept, and the bills and accounts relating to their transactions being made out at their warehouse, in the name of "Hoffman & Johnson;" it cannot be questioned but that a name thus assumed, recognized, and publicly used, became the legitimate name and style of the firm; not less so than if it had been adopted by the articles of partnership.

Id. (199) 396

Where a bill of exchange was drawn by A, after the dissolution of his partnership with B, and the proceeds of the bill went to pay, and did pay, the partnership debts of A & B, which A on the dissolution of the firm had assumed to pay; the holder of the bill after its dishonor can have no claim on B in consequence of the particular appropriation of the proceeds of the bill.

Id. (1b.) 396

4. It is admitted, that if one of the partners contracted with a third person, in the name of the firm after the dissolution, but that fact not made public, or known by such third person, the law considers the contract as being made with the firm, and on their credit. But if the partner deal with another in his individual name, and upon his sole responsibility, without even an allusion to the partnership, it was unimportant to that other to know that the partnership was dissolved, since he was dealing, not with the firm, and upon their credit, but with the individual with whom he was acting, upon his own credit.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

PATENT FOR LANDS—3.

1. Objections which are properly overruled, when urged against a legal title in support of an equity dependent entirely on a survey of land for which a patent has been issued, can have no weight when urged against a patent regularly issued in all the forms of law.

Lessee of Stringer v. Lessee of Young.

(340) 700

2 In Virginia, the patent is the completion of the title, and establishes the performance of every prerequisite. No inquiry into the regularity of those preliminary measures which ought to precede it is made in a trial at law. No case has shown that it may be impeached at law, unless it be for fraud—not legal and technical, but actual and positive fraud, in fact, committed by the person who obtained it; and even this is questioned.

PATENTS AND PATENT-RIGHTS—2.

1. It has not, and indeed it cannot be denied, that an inventor may abandon his invention, and surrender or dedicate it to the public. This inchoate right, thus gone, cannot afterward be resumed at his pleasure; for when gifts are once made to the public in this way, they become absolute. The question which generally arises on trials in a question of fact, rather than of law; whether the acts or acquiescence of the party, furnish, in the given case, satisfactory proof of an abandonment, or dedication of the invention to the public.

Pennoek et al. v. Dialogue.

(16) 332

2. It is obvious, that many of the provisions of our Patent Act, are derived from the principles and practice which have prevailed in the construction of the law of England in relation to patents.

Id.

(18) 333

3. Where English statutes, such for instance as the statute of frauds, and the statute of limitations, have been adopted into our own legislation; the known and settled construction of those statutes by courts of law, has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts; or has been received with all the weight of authority. This is not the case with the English statute of monopolies, which contains an exception, on which the grants of patents for inventions have issued in that country. The language of that clause in the statute is not identical with the patent law of the United States; but the construction of it adopted by the English courts, and the principles and practice which have long regulated the grants of their patents, as they must have been known, and are tacitly referred to in some of the provisions of our own statute, afford materials to illustrate it.

Id.

(Id.) 333

4. The true meaning of the words of the patent law, "not known or used before the application," is, not known or used by the public, before the application.

Id.

(19) 333

5. If an inventor should be permitted to hold back from the knowledge of the public the secrets of his invention; if he should, for a long period of years, retain the monopoly, and make and sell his invention publicly; and thus gather the whole profits of it, relying upon his superior skill and knowledge of the structure; and then, and then only, when the danger of competition should force him to procure the exclusive right, he should be allowed to take out a patent, and thus exclude the public from any further use than what should be derived under it during his fourteen years, it would materially retard the progress of science and the useful arts, and give a premium to those who should be least prompt to communicate their discoveries.

Id.

(Id.) 333

6. If an invention is used by the public, with the consent of the inventor, at the time of his application for a patent, how can the court say that his case is nevertheless such as the act was intended to protect? If such a public use is not a use within the meaning of the statute, how can the court extract the case from its operation, and support a patent, when the suggestions of the patentee were not true, and the conditions, on which alone the grant was authorized, do not exist?

Id.

(21) 334

7. The true construction of the patent law is, Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

that the first inventor cannot acquire a good title to a patent if he suffers the thing invented to go into public use, or to be publicly sold for use, before he makes application for a patent. This voluntary act or acquiescence in the public sale or use is an abandonment of his right; or, rather, creates a disability to comply with the terms and conditions of the law on which alone the Secretary of State is authorized to grant him a patent.

PAYMENT—1.

When no specific time for the payment of money is fixed in a contract, by which the same is to be paid by one party to the other, in judgment of law, the same is payable on demand.

The Bank of Columbia v. Hagner.

(463) 222

PEDIGREE—1.

1. A letter from a deceased member of a family, stating the pedigree of the family, and sworn by the wife to have been written by her husband, who also swore, in her deposition, that the facts stated in the letter had been frequently mentioned by her husband in his lifetime, is legal evidence; as is also the deposition of the witness in a question of pedigree.

Elliott et al. v. Peirsol et al.

(337) 169

2. The rule of evidence, that in questions of pedigree, the declarations of aged and deceased members of the family may be proved, and given in evidence, has not been controverted.

Id.

(Id.) 169

3. In a case, where a controversy had arisen, or was expected to arise, between parties, concerning the validity of a deed against which one of the parties claimed, but no controversy was then expected to arise about the heirship; a letter then written, stating the pedigree of the claimants, was not considered as excluded, by the rule of law, which declares that declarations relating to pedigree, made post litem motam, cannot be given in evidence.

PLEAS AND PLEADINGS—1.

1. Surplusage in pleading does not, in any case, vitiate after verdict.

Carroll v. Peake.

(23) 37

2. In a declaration upon an agreement, by way of lease, by which the lessor stipulated to let a farm from the first of January, 1820, to remove the former tenant, and that the lessor should have the tenancy and occupation of the farm from that day, free from all hindrance; the assignment of breaches was, that although specially requested on the said 1st of January, the defendant refused, and neglected to turn out the former tenant, who then was, or had been, in the possession and occupancy of the land, and to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff; this assignment is sufficient.

Id.

(Id.) 37

3. It is sufficient that the averment should state the plaintiff's readiness and offer, and his request, on the first day of January generally, and not at the last convenient hour of that day; and if an averment of a personal demand is made, it need not have been on the land.

Id.

(24) 37

4. The strict doctrines relative to averments in pleading have been applied to special pleas in bar, of tender, and some others of a peculiar character, and depending upon their own particular reasons.

Id.

(Id.) 37

5. Declarations containing general averments of readiness and request have been held sufficient, especially after verdict, unless in very peculiar cases.

Id.

(Id.) 37

6. The law requires every issue to be founded upon some certain point, that the parties may come prepared with their evidence, and not be taken by surprise, and the jury may not be misled by the introduction of various matters.

Minor et al. v. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria.

(67) 56

7. What defects in pleading are, and are not, cured by verdict.

Id.

(Id.) 56

8. On a joint and several bond the plaintiff may sue one or all of the obligors; but, in strictness of law he cannot sue an intermediate number. He must sue all or one. But if such error is not taken advantage of by plea in abatement, it is waived by pleading to the merits.

Id.

(73) 58

9. See Nolle prosequi, 1, 2, 3.

10. Where it was omitted to allege in the declaration on a promissory note, a demand of payment on the person of the maker, but it averred a demand at the bank "where the note was negotiable" such averment in the declaration could not be true, unless there was an agreement between the parties that the demand should be made there; and the averment must have been proved at the trial, or the plaintiff could not have obtained a verdict and judgment; and after a verdict the judgment will be sustained.

Brent's Executors v. The Bank of the Metropolis.

(93) 67

11. After the filing of a new count to a declaration, the defendant, who to the former counts has pleaded the general issue, or any particular plea, may withdraw the same, and plead anew, either the general issue or any further or other pleas, which his case may require; but he may, if he pleases, abide by his plea already pleaded, and waive his right of pleading, de novo. The failure to plead, and going to trial without objection, are held to be a waiver of his right to plead, and an election to abide by his plea; and if it, in terms, purports to go to the whole action, it is deemed sufficient to cover the whole declaration, and puts the plaintiff to the proof of his case on the new, as well as on the old counts.

Wright et al. v. The Lessee of Holingsworth,

(169) 98

12. When, upon a submission by one partner of all matters in controversy between the partnership and the person entering into the agreement of reference, an award was made directing the payment of money in an action on the bond, to abide by the award, the breach assigned was, that the partner who agreed to the reference did not pay, etc.; this is a sufficient assignment of a breach, as he only who agreed to the reference was bound to pay.

Karthauss v. Ferrer et al.,

13. See Attachment, 1.

14. The principle is, that a contract made by co-partners is several as well as joint, and the assumption is made by all and by each. It is obligatory on all, and on each of the partners. If, therefore, the defendant fails to avail himself of the variance in abatement, when the form of his plea obliges him to give the plaintiff a proper action; the policy of the law does not permit him to avail himself of it at the time of trial.

Barry v. Foyles,

(317) 160

15. The declaration in an action against one partner only, never gives notice of the claim being on a partnership transaction. The proceeding is always as if the party sued was the sole contracting party; and if the declaration were to show a partnership contract, the judgment against the single partner could not be sustained.

Id.

(1*b.*) 160

16. A question of the citizenship of a party to a cause cannot constitute a part of the issue on the merits; and must be brought forward by a proper plea in abatement, in an earlier stage of the cause than the trial on the merits.

D'Wolf v. Rabaud et al.,

(498) 237

17. The plaintiff, as administrator of W., had brought a suit in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, and recovered a judgment; and upon this judgment he instituted a suit in the District Court of the United States of the State of Mississippi against the defendant in the original suit. The defendant pleaded that by the Orphans' Court of Adams County, in the State of Mississippi, where the defendant resided, he had been appointed the administrator of W., and had continued to act in that capacity. Held, that the debt due upon the judgment obtained in Pennsylvania by the plaintiff, as administrator of W., was due to him in his personal capacity, and it was immaterial whether the defendant was or was not administrator of W., in the State of Mississippi. That would not, in any manner, affect the rights of the plaintiff, and the plea tenders an immaterial issue, and is bad on demurrer.

Biddle v. Wilkins,

(691) 317

18. Where the court in which judgment is rendered has not jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit, or where the judgment upon which suit is brought is absolutely void, this may be pleaded in bar; or may, in some cases, be given in evidence, under the general issue, in an action brought upon the judgment.

Id.

(1*b.*) 317

19. The general rule is, that there can be no aver-ment in pleading against the validity of a record, though there may be against its operation; and it is upon this ground that no matter of defense can be pleaded in such case to a suit on a judgment which existed anterior to the judgment.

Id.

(692) 318

20. It has become a settled practice in declaring in an action upon a judgment, not, as formerly, to set out in the declaration the whole of the proceedings in the original suit, but only to allege generally, that the plaintiff, by the consideration and judgment of that court, recovered the sum mentioned therein, the original cause of action having passed in rem judicatam.

Id.

(1*b.*) 318

21. In an action upon a judgment recovered in favor of an administrator, the plaintiff is not bound to make a profert of the letters of administration. That it is not necessary in actions upon such judgments that the plaintiff name himself as administrator, follows from his not being bound to make profert of the letters of administration; and when he does so name himself, it may be rejected as surplusage.

Id.

(1*b.*) 318

PLEAS AND PLEADING—3.

1. In the correct order of pleading it is necessary that the facts of the plea should be traversed by the replication, unless matter in avoidance be set up. It is not sufficient that the facts alleged in the replication be inconsistent with those stated in the plea; an issue must be taken on the material allegations of the plea.

United States v. Buford.

(31) 591

2. The Act of Virginia, passed in 1792, authorizes a defendant to plead and demur in the same case.

Fowle v. The Common Council of Alexandria.

(409) 723

3. The party who demurs to evidence, seeks thereby to withdraw the consideration of the facts from the jury; and is, therefore, bound to admit not only the truth of the evidence, but every fact which that evidence may legally conduce to prove in favor of the other party. And if upon any view of the facts the jury might have given a verdict against the party demurring, the court is also at liberty to give judgment against him.

Thornton v. The Bank of Washington.

(40) 595

PLEAS AND PLEADINGS—4.

1. A case came before the court on a judgment in the Circuit Court for the defendant, the avowant in replevin; he having demurred to the pleas of the plaintiff in an action of replevin. The court having reversed the judgment of the Circuit Court remanded the cause, with instructions to the Circuit Court to overrule the demurrer and permit the defendant, the avowant, to plead.

Lloyd v. Scott,

(205) 833

2. In an ejectment to recover a lot of land, being the first division lot laid out to the right of the society in the town of Pawlet, the plaintiffs are described in the writ as "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, a corporation duly established in England within the dominions of the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the members of which society are aliens, and subjects of the said king." The defendants pleaded the general issue of not guilty. The general issue admits the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, in the corporate capacity in which they have sued. The plaintiffs are a foreign corporation, the members of which are averred to be aliens, and British subjects; and the natural presumption is that they are residents abroad.

The Society for Propagating the Gospel v. The Town of Pawlet and Clarke, (480) 927

3. If the defendants meant to insist on the want of a corporate capacity in the plaintiffs to sue, it should have been insisted upon by a special plea in abatement or bar. Pleading to the merits has been held by this court to be an admission of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue. The general issue admits, not only the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, but to sue in the particular action which they bring.

POSSESSION OF LANDS—2.

Each of the parties held in possession distinct parts of the land in controversy. In this state of things it is well settled that the party having the better right, is in constructive possession of all the land not occupied, in fact, by his adversary.

Hunt v. Wickliffe, (212) 401

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT—1.

The Act of Congress for regulating the Post-Office Department does not, in terms, discharge the obligors in the official bond of a deputy-postmaster from the direct claim of the United States upon them, on the failure of the Postmaster-General to commence a suit against the defaulting postmaster within the time prescribed by law. Their liability, therefore, continues. They remain the debtors of the United States. The responsibility of the Postmaster-General is superadded to, not substituted for, that of the obligors.

Dox et al. v. The Postmaster-General, (323) 162

PRACTICE—1.

1. See Chancery Practice, passim.

2. In a trial in an action of ejectment, in which, according to the provisions of the laws of Tennessee, the defendant was held to bail, the declaration stated two demises by H. & K., citizens of Pennsylvania; and the other, the demise of B. & G., citizens of Massachusetts. The cause coming on for trial before a jury, the plaintiffs suffered a nonsuit, which was set aside; and the court, on the motion of the plaintiffs, permitted the declaration to be amended, by adding a count on the demise of S., a citizen of Missouri. The parties went to trial without any other pleading; and the jury found for the plaintiff upon the third, or new count, and a judgment was rendered in his favor. Held to be valid.

Wright et al. v. The Lessee of Holingsworth, (165) 96

3. The allowance and refusal of amendments in the pleadings, the granting and refusing new trials, and most of the other incidental orders made in the progress of a cause before trial, are matters so peculiarly addressed to the sound discretion of the courts of original jurisdiction as to be fit for their decision only, under their own rules and modes of practice. This court has always declined interfering in such cases.

4. On a trial upon the merits, it is too late to take exception to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue; this should have been done by a plea in abatement, before the trial; and the omission to do this is a waiver of the objection.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (450) 217

5. When the state of the record did not show a judgment of nonsuit to have been entered, although the bill of exceptions states the fact, the plaintiff may apply for a certiorari to bring up a perfect record, or dismiss the writ of error, and proceed de novo.

Elmore v. Grymes, (472) 226

6. The State of Ohio, not having been admitted into the Union until 1802, the Act of Congress passed May 8th, 1792, which is expressly confined in its operations to the day of its passage, in adopting the practice of the State courts into the courts of the United States, could have no operation in that State; but the District Court of the United States, established in that State in 1803, was vested with all the powers and jurisdiction of the District Court of Kentucky, which exercised full circuit court jurisdiction, with power to create a practice for its own government. The District Court of Ohio did not create a system for itself, but finding one established in the State, in the true spirit of the policy pursued by the United States, proceeded to administer justice according to the practice of the State courts, and by a single rule adopted the State system of practice. When in 1807, the seventh circuit was established, the judge assigned to that circuit found the practice of the State adopted, in fact, into the Circuit Court of the United States, and the same has since, so far as it was found practicable and convenient, by a uniform understanding, been pursued without any positive rule upon the subject.

Fullerton v. The Bank of the United States, (612) 283

7. The Act of 18th February, 1820, relative to proceedings against parties to promissory notes, was a very wise and benevolent law, and its salutary effects produced its immediate adoption into the practice of the courts of the United States, and Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

the suits have in many instances been prosecuted under it.

Id. (613) 284

8. It will not be contended that the practice of a court can only be sustained by written rules, nor that a party pursuing a form or mode of proceeding sanctioned by the most solemn acts of the court through a course of years, is to be surprised and turned out of court upon a ground which has no bearing upon the merits. Written rules are unquestionably to be preferred, because of their certainty; but there can be no want of certainty where long acquiescence has established it to be the law of the court that the State practice shall be their practice, as far as they have the means of carrying it into effect, or until deviated from by positive rules of their own making.

Id. (Ib.) 284

9. Although the act of the Legislature of Ohio regulating the mode of proceeding in actions on promissory notes was passed after the making of the note upon which this action was brought, yet the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Ohio, having incorporated the action under that statute, with all its incidents, into its course of practice, and having full power by law to adopt it, there does not appear any legal objection to its doing so, in the prosecution of the system under which it has always acted.

10. Where the record from the court below contained the whole proceedings in the case, and exhibited all the matters either party required for a final disposition of the case, and the counsel for both the appellant and the appellees, were willing to submit, upon argument, the whole case to the final decision of the court, but it appeared that the Circuit Court of Ohio had not decided any question but that which had been raised upon the jurisdiction of the court, the counsel were directed by this court to argue the point of jurisdiction only.

PRACTICE—2.

1. See Bills of exceptions.

2. See Re-argument.

3. Where the appellee had died after the commencement of the term, and the court not knowing his decease had decided upon the case, after argument, the court ordered the decree to be entered as of the first day of the term.

The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, (481) 492

4. Where an appeal from the Circuit Court to this court was prayed by a number of the defendants, and one only executed the proper appeal bond, the objection to the proceeding ought to have been taken by way of preliminary motion to dismiss the appeal for irregularity, on account of the failure to give the proper appeal bond.

Mandeville v. Riggs, (490) 495

2. The declaration purported to count upon sixty-eight bills of the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and it appeared that one of the bills had been omitted to be described, so that the declaration made out a less sum than the writ claimed or the judgment gave. The defendants in error, plaintiffs below, moved for leave to cure the defect by entering a remittitur of the amount of the bill so omitted and damages pro tanto. This court thinks itself authorized to make a precedent in furtherance of justice, whereby a more convenient practice may be introduced, and to allow the party to enter his remittitur; but on payment of the costs of the writ, if error is prosecuted no further after such amendment made.

Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Wister et al., (329) 440

PRACTICE—3.

1. Where an appeal has been dismissed, the appellant having omitted to file a transcript of the record within the time required by the rule of court, an official certificate of the dismissal of the appeal may not be given by the clerk during the term. The appellant may file the transcript with the clerk during the term, and move to have the appeal re-instated. To allow such certificate would be to prejudice such a motion.

The United States et al. v. Swann, (68) 605

2. In a writ of right the tenant may, on the nise joined, set up a title out of himself and in a third person. If anything which fell from this court in the case of Greene v. Lister, 8 Cranch, 229, can be supposed to give countenance to the opposite doctrine, it is done away by the explanation given by the court in Greene v. Watkins, 7 Wheaton, 31. It is there laid down that the tenant may give in evidence the title in a third person for the purpose of disproving the demandant's seisin; that a writ of right does bring into controversy the mere right of the parties to the suit, and if so, it by consequence authorizes either party to establish by evidence that the other has no right whatever in the demanded premises, or that this mere right is inferior to that set up against him.

Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's

Snug Harbor, (133) 629

3. In a writ of right on the mise joined on the mere right, under a count for the entire right, a demandant may recover a less quantity than the entirety.

Id. (135) 630

4. Where the point on which the judges of the Circuit Court divided in opinion was not certified, but the point of difference was to be ascertained from the whole record, the court refused to take jurisdiction of the case.

D'Wolf v. Usher, (269) 675

5. The plaintiff in error having died while the cause was held under advisement, the judgment was entered nunc pro tunc, as on the first day of this term.

Clay v. Smith, (411) 723

9. The practice has uniformly been, since the seat of government was removed to Washington, for the clerk of the court to enter at the first term to which any writ of error or appeal is returnable, in cases in which the United States are parties, the appearance of the Attorney-General of the United States. This practice has never been objected to. The practice would not be conclusive against the Attorney-General if he should at the first term withdraw his appearance, or move to strike it off. But if he lets it pass for one term, it is conclusive upon him as to an appearance. The decisions of this court have uniformly been that an appearance cures any defects in the forms of process.

Farrar and Brown v. The United States, (459) 741

7. The subpoena issued on the filing of a bill in which the State of New Jersey were complainants and the State of New York were defendants, was served upon the Governor and Attorney-General of New York sixty days before the return day, the day of the service and return inclusive. This being irregular, a second subpoena issued, which was served on the Governor of New York only, the Attorney-General being absent. There was no appearance by the State of New York. BY THE COURT: This is not like the case of several defendants, where a service on one might be good, though not on another. Here the service prescribed by the rule is to be on the governor, and on the Attorney-General. A service on one is not sufficient to entitle the court to proceed.

The State of New Jersey v. The State of New York, (461) 741

8. Upon an application by the counsel for the State of New Jersey that a day might be assigned to argue the question of the jurisdiction of this court to proceed in the case, the court said they had no difficulty in assigning a day. It might be as well to give notice to the State of New York, as they might employ counsel in the interim. It, indeed, the argument should be merely ex-parte, the court could not feel bound by its decision if the State of New York desired to have the question again argued.

Id. (464) 742

9. A notice was given by the solicitors for the State of New Jersey to the Governor of the State of New York, dated the 12th of January, 1830, stating that a bill had been filed on the equity side of the Supreme Court by the State of New Jersey, against the people of the State of New York, and that on the 13th of February following, the court would be moved in the case for such order as the court might deem proper, &c. Afterwards, on the day appointed, no counsel having appeared for the State of New York, on the motion of the counsel for the State of New Jersey for a subpoena to be served on the Governor and Attorney-General of the State of New York the court said, as no counsel appears to argue the motion on the part of the State of New York, and the precedent for granting it has been established upon very grave and solemn argument, the court do not require an ex-parte argument in favor of their authority to grant the subpoena, but will follow the precedent heretofore established. The State of New York will be at liberty to contest the proceeding at a future time in the course of the cause, if they shall choose so to do.

PRACTICE—4.

1. The practice of bringing the whole of the charge of the court delivered to the jury in the court below for review before this court is unauthorized, and extremely inconvenient both to the inferior and to the Appellate Court. With the charge of the court to the jury upon mere matters of fact, and with its commentaries upon the weight of evidence, this court has nothing to do. Observations of that nature are understood to be addressed to the jury merely for their consideration as the ultimate judges of the matters of fact, and are entitled to no more weight or importance than the jury in the exercise of their own judgment choose to give them. They neither are, nor are understood to be, binding on them, as the true and conclusive exposition of the evidence. If, in summing up the evidence to the jury, the court should mistake the law, that would justly furnish a ground for an exception. But the exception should be strictly confined to that misstatement; and by being made known at the moment, would often enable the court to correct an erroneous expression, so as to explain or qualify it in such manner as to make it wholly unexceptionable, or perfectly distinct.

Carver v. Astor, (1) 761

2. A rule had been granted on the district judge of the northern district of New York, to show cause why he did not sign a bill of exceptions in a case tried before him. The court said, that on the day of the return of the rule, the district judge has a right to show cause; whether the person who obtained the rule moves or not. He has a right to have the rule disposed of.

5. Where the whole cause, and not a point or points in the cause, has been adjourned from the Circuit Court to this court, the case will be remanded to the Circuit Court.

Saunders v. Gould, (392) 897

6. In an ejectment to recover a lot of land, being the first division lot laid out to the right of the society in the town of Pawlet, the plaintiffs are described in the writ as "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, a corporation duly established in England within the dominions of the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the members of which society are aliens, and subjects of the said king." The defendants pleaded the general issue of not guilty. The general issue admits the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, in the corporate capacity in which they have sued.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts v. The Town of Pawlet, and Clarke, (480) 927

7. If the defendants meant to insist on the want of a corporate capacity in the plaintiffs to sue, it should have been insisted upon by a special plea in abatement or bar. Pleading to the merits has been held by this court to be an admission of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue. The general issue admits, not only the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, but to sue in the particular action which they bring.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—3.

PRIORITY OF THE UNITED STATES—1.

1. What is the nature and effect of the priority of the United States, under the statute of 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (438) 211

2. It is obvious that the latter clause of the 65th section of the Act of 1799 is merely an explanation of the term "insolvency" used in the first clause, and embraces three classes of cases, all of which relate to living debtors. The case of deceased debtors stands wholly upon the alternative, in the former part of the enactment.

Id. (439) 212

3. Insolvency, in the sense of the statute, relates to such a general divestment of property as would in fact be equivalent to insolvency in its technical sense. It supposes that all the debtor's property has passed from him. This was the language of the decision in the case of The United States v. Hooe (3 Cranch, 73); and it was consequently held that an assignment of part of the debtor's property did not fall within the provision of the statute.

Id. (Ib.) 212

4. Mere inability of the debtor to pay all his debts is not an insolvency within the statute; but it must be manifested in one of the three modes pointed out in the explanatory clause of the section.

Id. (Ib.) 212

5. The priority, as limited and established in favor of the United States, is not a right which supersedes and overrules the assignment of the debtor, as to any property which the United States may afterwards elect to take in execution, so as to prevent its passing by virtue of such assignment to the assignees; but it is a mere right of prior payment, out of the general funds of the debtor in the hands of the assignees; and the assignees are rendered personally liable if they omit to discharge the debt due to the United States.

Id. (Ib.) 212

6. It is true that in discussions in courts of equity a mortgage is sometimes called a lien for a debt; and so it certainly is, and something more; it is a transfer of the property itself, as security for the debt. This must be admitted to be true at law, and it is equally true in equity; for in this respect equity follows the law. The estate is considered as a trust, and according to the intention of the parties, as a qualified estate and security. When the debt is discharged, there is a resulting trust for the mortgagee. It is therefore only in a loose and general sense that it is sometimes called a lien, and then only by way of contrast, to an estate absolute and indefeasible.

Id. (441) 213

7. It has never yet been decided by this court that the priority of the United States will divest a specific lien attached to anything, whether it be accompanied by possession or not.

Id. (Ib.) 213

8. The case of Thelusson v. Smith (2 Wheat., 396) turned upon its own particular circumstances, and did not establish any principles different from those which are recognized in this case. And it establishes no such proposition as that a specific and perfected lien can be displaced by the mere priority of the United States.

Id. (444) 214

9. It is not understood that a general lien by judgment on lands constitutes, per se, a property or right in the land itself. It only confers a right to levy on the same, to the exclusion of other adverse interests, subsequent to the judgment; and when the levy is actually made on the same, the title of the creditor relates back to the time of the judgment, so as to cut out intermediate incumbrances. But subject to this, the debtor has full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the land.

Id. (443) 214

PRIORITY OF THE UNITED STATES—3.

1. Twenty-three cases of silk were imported from Canton in the ship Rob Roy into the port of Boston, consigned to George D'Wolf and John Smith.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4. U. S., Book 7.

After the arrival of the vessel with the merchandise on board, the collector caused an inspector of the customs to be placed on board. Soon afterwards, and prior to the entry of the merchandise, and prior to the payment or any security for the payment of the duties thereon, the merchandise was attached by the deputy-sheriff of the county, in due form of law, as the property of G. D'Wolf and J. Smith, by virtue of several writs of attachment issued from the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Suffolk, at the suit of creditors of G. D'Wolf and J. Smith. These attachments were so made prior to the inspector's being sent on board the vessel. At the time of the attachment, the sheriff offered to give security for the payment of the duties on the merchandise, which the collector declined accepting. The merchandise was sent to the custom-house stores by the inspector, and several days after, the custom-house store-keeper gave to the deputy-sheriff an agreement signed by him, reciting the receipt of the merchandise from the inspector, and stating, "I hold the said merchandise to the order of James Dennie, deputy-sheriff." The marshal of the United States afterwards attached, took, and sold the merchandise under writs and process in favor of the United States, against George D'Wolf; which writs were founded on duty bonds, due and unpaid, for a larger amount than the value of the merchandise, given before by D'Wolf and Smith; who, before the importation of the merchandise, were indebted to the United States on various bonds for duties, besides those on which the suits were instituted. Held, that the attachments issued out of the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Suffolk, did not affect the rights of the United States to hold the merchandise until the payment of the duties upon them; and that the merchandise was not liable to any attachment by an officer of the State of Massachusetts for debts due to other creditors of George D'Wolf and John Smith.

Harris v. Dennie. (292) 683

2. The United States have no general lien on merchandise, the property of the importer, for duties due by him upon other importations. The only effect of the first provision in the sixty-second section of the Act of 1799, ch. 128, is that the delinquent debtor is denied at the custom-house any further credit for duties until his unsatisfied bonds are paid. He is compellable to pay the duties in cash, and upon such payment he is entitled to the delivery of the goods imported. The manifest intention of the remaining clause in the section is to compel the original consignee to enter the goods imported by him.

Id. (302) 687

3. No person but the owner or original consignee, or in his absence or sickness his agent or factor, is entitled to enter the goods at the custom-house, or give bond for the duties, or to pay the duties (sec. 36 and 62). Upon the entry the original invoices are to be produced and sworn to; and the whole objects of the act would be defeated by allowing a mere stranger to make the entry, or take the oath prescribed on the entry.

Id. (304) 687

4. The United States having a lien on goods imported for the payment of the duties accruing on them, and which have not been secured by bond, and being entitled to the custody of them from the time of their arrival in port until the duties are paid or secured, any attachment by a State officer is an interference with such lien and right to custody, and, being repugnant to the laws of the United States, is void.

Id. (305) 688

5. The acknowledgment of the custom-house store-keeper that he holds goods upon which the duties have not been secured or paid, subject to an attachment issued out of a State court at the suit of a creditor of the importer, was a plain departure from his duty, and is not authorized by the law of the United States, and cannot be admitted to vary the rights of the parties.

Id. (Ib.) 688

PRIORITY OF THE UNITED STATES—4.

1. The plaintiff in replevin, James D'Wolf, claimed the merchandise under an assignment executed by George D'Wolf and John Smith to him, in consideration of a large sum of money due by them to James D'Wolf, and in consideration of advances to be made to them by him. The assignment transferred four vessels and their cargoes, three of which vessels were then at sea, and one in New York ready to sail, the property of the assignors.

The assignment was to be void on the payment to James D'Wolf of the money due to him; and if it should not be paid, the assignee to enforce the pledge by process and arrest in all countries or places whatsoever, and to sell the same for the payment of the amount due by them, the assignors, to George D'Wolf. The merchandise for which this action of replevin was instituted was part of the return cargo of one of the vessels. The defendant, Harris, pleaded that the merchandise was not the property of the plaintiff, but of George D'Wolf and John Smith; and justified the taking of the goods of the plaintiff, as marshal of the district of Massachusetts, by virtue of a writ of attachment sued out in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, in which suit judgment was obtained against George D'Wolf. On the trial, the plaintiff in the replevin proved the assignment; that large sums of money were due to him by George D'Wolf and John Smith; that the goods were part of the property assigned; that he had used all proper means to take possession of the goods, but was prevented by the attachment issued by the United States. The defendant proved that the goods were imported into the United States by D'Wolf and Smith; and that at the time of the importation they were indebted to the United States for duties which were due and unpaid to an amount exceeding the value of the merchandise attached; and that the Octavia, one of the vessels assigned, with a cargo on board ready for sea, was at New York at the time of the assignment; which ship was not delivered to James D'Wolf, the assignee, nor were the bills of lading assigned; the cargoes on board the vessels being consigned to the masters for sales and return.

By THE COURT: In the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company (1 Peters, 306), it was decided that the nondelivery of a vessel assigned to secure or pay a bona fide debt did not make the assignment absolutely void. This court is well satisfied with that opinion.

Harris v. D'Wolf, (147) 812

2. The deed of assignment conveyed to the assignee a right to the proceeds of the outward bound cargoes on board the vessels assigned to James D'Wolf. The failure of George D'Wolf to deliver to the assignee the copies of the bills of lading which were in his possession did not leave the property subject to the attachment of creditors, who had no notice of the deed. It was held in the case of Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company that such a transfer gives the assignee a right to take and hold those proceeds against any person but the consignee of the cargo, or purchaser from the consignee without notice.

Id. (148) 812

3. That the consignees of the merchandise were indebted to the United States on duty bonds remaining due and unpaid at the time of the importation, did not, under the sixty-second section of the Act of March 2d, 1799, make the merchandise, as to the United States, the property of the consignees, notwithstanding the assignment; and make the attachment of the United States for the debt due to them sufficient to bar the action of replevin brought by the assignee.

Id. (Ib.) 812

PROMISSORY NOTE—1.

1. In an action against the indorser of a promissory note made "negotiable in the Bank of the Metropolis," the declaration averred a demand of the same at that bank. No other notice of the non-payment of the note was sent to the indorser but that left for him at the Bank of the Metropolis; and it was proved that there was an agreement, by parol, with the indorser, as to other notes discounted previously by the bank for his accommodation, that payment and demand of payment should be made at the bank; the indorser residing a considerable distance from the bank. Held to be sufficient.

Brent's Executors v. The Bank of the Metropolis, (89) 65

2. The indorser of such note is himself bound by the contract made by the drawer, and by the established and known usage of the bank.

Id. (93) 67

3. A promissory note was made at Georgetown, payable at the Bank of Columbia, in that town; the defendant, the indorser of the note, living in the County of Alexandria, within the District of Columbia, and having what was alleged to be a place of business in the city of Washington; and the notice of the nonpayment of the note, inclosed in a letter and superscribed with his name, was put into the post-office at Georgetown, addressed to him at that place. Held, that this notice was sufficient.

The Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, (582) 271

4. In cases where the party entitled to notice resides in the country, unless notice sent by the mail is sufficient, a special messenger must be employed for the purpose of sending it, but this case is not one which required such a duty.

Id. (Ib.) 271

5. If the defendant had a place of business in the city of Washington, and the notice served there would be good, yet it by no means follows that service at his place of residence in another place would not be equally good. Parties may be and frequently are so situated that notice may well be given at either of several places.

Id. (Ib.) 271

6. That is not properly a place of business, in the commercial understanding of the terms, which has no public notoriety as such, no open or public business carried on at it by the party, but only occasional employment by him there, two or three times a week, in a house occupied by another person, the party only engaged in settling up his old business.

Id. (Ib.) 271

7. The general rule is, that the party whose duty it is to give notice of the dishonor of a bill or note, is bound to use due diligence in communicating the same. But it is not required of him to see that the notice is brought home to the party. He may employ the usual and ordinary modes of conveyance; and whether the notice reaches the party or not, the holder has done all that the law requires of him.

Id. (Ib.) 271

8. It seems to be well settled that when the facts are ascertained and undisputed, what shall constitute due diligence is a question of law.

Id. (583) 271

9. The rules relative to diligence ought to be reasonable, and founded in general convenience, and with a view to clog, as little as possible, consistently with the safety of the parties, the circulation of paper of this description.

Id. (Ib.) 271

10. When a person has a dwelling-house and a counting-room in the same city or town, a notice sent to either place is sufficient: if parties live in different post-towns, notice through the post-office is sufficient. Notice to a party living at another place than the holder, sent by mail to the nearest post-office, is good under common circumstances, and in such cases where notice is sent by mail, it is distance alone, or the usual course of receiving letters, which must determine the sufficiency of the notice.

Id. (Ib.) 271

11. Some countenance has lately been given in England to the practice of sending a notice by a special messenger in extraordinary cases, by allowing the holder to recover of the indorser the expenses of serving the notice in this manner. The holder is not bound to use the mail for the purpose of sending the notice. He may employ a special messenger if he pleases, but it has not been decided that he must. To compel the holder to the expense of a special messenger would be unreasonable.

Id. (584) 272

12. Modern decisions go to establish that if a note be at the place where it is payable on the day it falls due, the onus of proving payment falls upon the parties who are liable to pay it; and the instructions of the Circuit Court, in this case, were more favorable to the parties to the note, where the court said, upon the sufficiency of the demand, that on an article or a note made payable at a particular bank, it is sufficient to show that the note had been discounted, and become the property of the bank, and that it was in the bank, and not paid when at maturity.

Fullerton v. The Bank of the United States, (616) 285

PROMISSORY NOTE—2.

1. The notary public, after the note became due, called at the house of the indorser, who resided in the city of Cincinnati, which he found shut up and the door locked; and on inquiry of the nearest resident, he was informed that the indorser and family had left town on a visit; whether for a day, week, or month, he did not know nor did he inquire. He made use of no further diligence to ascertain where the indorser had gone, or whether he had left any person in town to attend to his business. He left a notice at the house of a person adjoining, with a request to hand it to the indorser when he should return. Held, that this was sufficient diligence on the part of the holders of the note to charge the indorser.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Williams v. The Bank of the United States.

2. The general rule of law applicable to this subject has long been settled that to enable the holder of a bill of exchange or promissory note to charge the indorser, it is incumbent on him to prove that timely notice of the dishonor of the bill, or of the nonpayment of the note, was given to the indorser; or if this could not be done, he must excuse the omission by showing that due diligence had been used to give such notice.

Id.

3. If the parties reside in the same city or town, the indorser must be personally notified of the dishonor of the bill or note, either verbally or in writing; or a written notice must be left at his dwelling-house or place of business. Either mode is sufficient, but one or other must be observed unless it is prevented by the act of the party entitled to the notice.

Id.

4. The holder of a bill or promissory note, in order to entitle himself to call upon the drawer or indorser, must give notice of its dishonor to the party whom he means to charge. But if, when the notice should be given, the party entitled to it should be absent from the State, and has left no known agent to receive it; if he abscond, or has no place of residence which reasonable diligence used by the holder can enable him to discover, the law dispenses with the necessity of giving regular notice.

Id.

5. Where the parties reside in the same city or town, the notice should be given at the dwelling-house, or place of business, and the duty of the holder does not require him to give the notice at any other place.

Id.

6. C., the indorser of the note, at the time it fell due, lived in a house in Georgetown, except the lower front room, which was occupied separately as a store by one of his sons. There was a separate entrance to the dwelling part of the house through an alley or passage, apart from the store, which led to the upper rooms, and back buildings, and yard of the house. The son of C., who occupied the store, had a dwelling-house separate from the store. C. was at that time postmaster of Georgetown, and kept the post-office in another part of the town; where he usually transacted his private business as well as that of his office. C. had no concern in his son's store, but he was frequently about the door. Until he took charge of the post-office, which was a year before the note fell due, written communications and notices for him were sometimes left at the store, and were carried by another of his sons, unless when he forgot it, to him. After C. took possession of the post-office, if notices had been left at the store for C., the bearer of them would have been directed to take them to the post-office, or they would have been delivered to him by his son at the post-office, if recollected, or if they had been seen when left at the store. The notary stated that he believed the notice of nonpayment of the note was left at the store, because he thought that he had frequently notices to give to the defendant, and was in the habit of leaving them at the store, and he never had been in the dwelling-house, or in the passage or alley. Held, that this notice was not sufficient of nonpayment of the note to charge C. with a liability to pay the note.

The Bank of the United States v. Coreman.

7. If notice of the nonpayment of a note, although left at an improper place, was nevertheless, in point of fact, received in due time by the indorser, and so proved, or could from the evidence in the cause be properly presumed by the jury; it is sufficient in point of law to charge the indorser.

Id.

8. The law in Kentucky is settled, as it is in Virginia and in this court; that upon Virginia contracts by indorsement of promissory notes, every reasonable effort must be made to recover of the drawer by suit, before the assignee can have resource against the assignor or indorser.

The Bank of the United States v. Weisiger,

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

9. It is upon the question what constitutes such diligence, that all the difficulties arise in suits upon these contracts. And certainly this court cannot be called upon to carry the obligations imposed upon assignees on this point further than the State courts have already extended them.

Id.

10. What will be considered a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the laws of Kentucky, imposing diligence in the prosecution of a suit against the drawer of a note, by the indorsee, in order to charge a prior indorser.

Id.

11. The discharge of an insolvent under the statutes, is the most satisfactory evidence of insolvency. After such discharge, it is not required that process of execution shall be issued against the party, in order to conform to the injunction of diligence.

Id.

12. The evidence in the case was, that the day when the note became due, the bank being the holder thereof, and it being payable there, after the usual banking hours were over it was delivered to a notary by the officers of the bank, they informing him at the time that there were no funds there for the payment of the note. This was a sufficient proof of due demand of payment.

The Bank of the United States v. Carneal.

13. When a note is payable at a bank it is not necessary to make any personal demand upon the maker elsewhere. It is his duty to be at the bank within the usual hours of business to pay the same, and if he omits so to do, and a demand is there made of payment by the holder within those hours, and it is refused or neglected to be made, the holder is entitled to maintain his action for such dishonor.

Id.

14. It is difficult to lay down any universal rule as to what is due diligence in respect to notice to indorsers. Many cases must be decided upon their own particular circumstances, however desirable it may be, when practicable, to lay down a general rule.

Id.

15. When notice is sent by the mail, it is sufficient to direct it to the town where the party resides, if it is a post-town; if it is not, then to the post-office or post-town nearest to his residence, if known. But the rule as to the nearest post-office is not of universal application; for if the party is in the habit of receiving his letters at a more distant post-office, or through a more circuitous route, and the fact is known to the person sending notice, notice sent by the latter mode will be good. And where the party is in the habit of receiving his letters at various post-offices, to suit his own convenience or business, it may be sufficient to send it to either.

Id.

16. A suggestion was made at the bar that the letter to the indorser, stating the demand and dishonor of the note, is not sufficient unless the party sending it also informs the indorser that he is looked to for payment. But where such notice is sent by the holder, or by his order, it necessarily implies such a responsibility over.

Buckner v. Finley,

Peters 528

PROMISSORY NOTES—3.

1. An action was brought by The Union Bank of Georgetown against George B. Magruder as indorser of a promissory note drawn by George Magruder. The maker of the note died before it became payable, and letters of administration to his estate were taken out by the indorser. No notice of the nonpayment of the note was given to the indorser, or any demand of payment made until the institution of this suit. Held, that the indorser was discharged, and his having become the administrator of the drawer does not relieve the holder from the obligation to demand payment of the note, and to give notice thereof to the indorser. The general rule that payment must be demanded from the maker of a note, and notice of nonpayment forwarded to the indorser within due time in order to render him liable, is so firmly settled that no authority need be cited to support it. Due diligence to obtain payment from the maker is a condition precedent on which the liability of the indorser depends.

Magruder v. The Union Bank of Georgetown. (90) 613

2. A note was discounted at the office of discount and deposit of The Bank of the United States in the city of Washington, for the accommodation of the drawer, indorsed by Magruder and by M'Donald; neither of the indorsers receiving any value for his indorsement, but indorsing the note at the request of the drawer, without any communication with each other. The note was renewed from time to time, under the same circumstances, and was at length protested for non-payment: and separate suits having been brought by the bank against the indorsers, the drawer being insolvent, judgments in favor of the bank were obtained against both the indorsers. The bank issued an execution against Magruder, the first indorser, and he having paid the whole debt and costs, instituted this suit against M'Donald, the second indorser, for a contribution, claiming one-half of the sum so paid by him in satisfaction of the judgment obtained by the bank. Held, that he was not entitled to recover.

M'Donald v. Magruder. (470) 744

3. That a prior indorser is, in the regular course of business, liable to his indorsee, although that indorsee may have afterwards indorsed the note, is unquestionable. When he takes up the note he becomes the holder as entirely as if he had never parted with it, and may sue the indorser for the amount. The first indorser undertakes that the maker shall pay the note, or that he, if due diligence he used, will pay it for him. This undertaking makes him responsible to every holder, and to every person whose name is on the note subsequent to his own, and who has been compelled to pay its amount.

Id. (474) 746

4. The indorser of a promissory note who receives no value for his indorsement from a subsequent indorser, or from the drawer, cannot set up the want of consideration received by himself; he is not permitted to say that the promise is made without consideration; because money paid by the promisee to another, is as valid a consideration as if paid to the promisor himself.

Id. (476) 746

PROMISSORY NOTES—4.

1. Action by the indorsees against the indorser of a promissory note, drawn and indorsed in the State of Kentucky. The statute of Kentucky authorizing the assignment of notes is silent as to the duties of the assignee or the nature of the contract created by the assignment. It only declares such assignments valid, and the assignee capable of suing in his own name. But the courts of that State have clearly defined his rights, duties and obligations resulting from the assignment. The assignee cannot maintain an action on the mere nonpayment of the note and notice thereof, until the holder of the note has made use of all due and legal diligence to recover the money from the drawer; whose engagement is held to be that he will pay the amount, if after due and diligent pursuit the maker is found insolvent.

Bank of The United States v. Tyler. (366) 888

2. The principles of the law of Kentucky relative to the liability of indorsers on promissory notes, and proceedings to establish the same, as settled by the decisions of the courts of Kentucky.

Id. (Ib.) 888

3. After judgment obtained in the Circuit Court of the United States against the drawer of a note, a capias ad satisfaciendum was issued against him by the holder, and he was put in prison. Two justices of the peace ordered his discharge, claiming to proceed according to the law of Kentucky in the case of insolvent debtors; and the jailer permitted him to leave the prison. The jailer made himself and his securities liable for an escape, by permitting the prisoner to leave the prison. The neglect of the holder of the note to proceed against the jailer and his securities, prevents his making the indorser liable for the amount of the note.

Id. (Ib.) 888

4. The general principle of all the cases is that a plaintiff must pursue with legal diligence all his means and remedies, direct, immediate, or collateral, to recover the amount of his debt from the drawer of the note, or anyone else who has put himself, or has by operation of law been put in his place.

PUBLIC AGENTS—3.

1. When money of the United States has been received by one public agent from another public agent, whether it was received in an official or private capacity, there can be no doubt but that it was received to the use of the United States; and they may maintain an action against the receiver for the same.

The United States v. Buford. (23) 590

2. B, a Deputy Commissary-General of the United States, received from M, a Deputy Quartermaster-General of the United States, the sum of $10,000, and acknowledged the same by a receipt signed by him with his official description. The United States had a right to treat M as their agent in the transaction, by making B their debtor, and to an action brought against him for money had and received, the statute of limitations is no bar.

Id. (29) 590

RE-ARGUMENT—2.

The court refused to hear a re-argument upon a point decided in the case of Fullerton et al. v. The Bank of the United States (1 Peters, 612), that the act of the Legislature of Ohio relative to proceedings against parties to promissory notes had been well adopted as a rule of practice in the courts of the United States for the State of Ohio.

Williams v. The Bank of the United States. (106) 363

RECORDING OF DEEDS—1.

1. The Registry Act of Ohio directs that all deeds made within the State shall be recorded within six months from the time of the actual execution thereof, and declares that if any such deed shall not be recorded in the county where the land lies, within the limits allowed by law, "the same shall be deemed fraudulent and void, against any subsequent purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice of such deed."

Steele's Lessee v. Spencer. (559) 262

2. In the construction of the Registry Act of Ohio, the term "purchasers" is usually taken in its limited legal sense. It means a complete purchaser; or, in other words, a purchaser clothed with a legal title.

Id. (Ib.) 262

3. It is not necessary that a deed made to a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice shall be recorded to give it operation against a prior unrecorded deed, as by the provisions of the registry acts the prior deed is declared in itself absolutely void as against such purchaser.

Id. (560) 262

4. A decree of the Supreme Court of Ohio ordered that the patentee of a certain tract of land should, within six months, make a deed, &c., with covenants of warranty conveying a portion of the land held under a patent to the complainants in that suit, and on the failure of A to make the said deed, &c., "that then and in that case, the complainant shall hold, possess and enjoy the said portion of land, in as full and ample a manner as if the same had been conveyed to him." The decree of the Supreme Court of Ohio, by which a conveyance of land is directed to be made, the decree being according to the laws of Ohio, vested in those to whom the deed was ordered to be made, such a legal title to the land to have been conveyed by the deed as would have been vested by a deed of equal date; and the Registry Act of Ohio applies as well to a title under such a decree as it would do if the party held under a bona fide deed of the same date with the patent of the land, and the decree gives a legal title as ample as a deed.

Elliott v. Peirsol. (339) 170

RECORDS—4.

The record of proceedings against "unknown heirs" is no evidence that any such heirs existed, and the decree and deed made in pursuance of it cannot avail to pass any title, without some evidence that there were some heirs.

Hollingsworth v. Barbour et al. (466) 922

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

RELEASE—1.

At Common Law, the release of a debtor whose person is in execution, is a release of the judgment itself. The law will not permit proceedings by a creditor at the same time against the person and estate of his debtor, and where an election has been made to take the person, it presumes satisfaction, if the person be voluntarily released.

The United States v. Stansbury et al., (575) 268

REMAINDER—4.

1. The uses declared in a deed of marriage settlement were to and for the use of "Joanna Philipse and Beverly Robinson (the releasees) and their heirs, until the solemnization of the said intended marriage; and from and immediately after the solemnization of the said intended marriage, then to the use and behoof of the said Mary Philipse and Roger Morris, and the survivor of them, for and during the time of their natural lives, without impeachment of waste; and from and after the determination of that estate, then to the use and behoof of such child or children as shall or may be procreated between them, and to his, her or their heirs and assigns forever. But in case the said Roger Morris and Mary Philipse shall have no child or children begotten between them, or that such child or children shall happen to die during the lifetime of the said Roger and Mary, and the said Mary should survive the said Roger without issue, then to the use and behoof of her, the said Mary Philipse, and her heirs and assigns forever. And in case the said Roger should survive the said Mary Philipse, without any issue by her, or that such issue is then dead, without leaving issue; then, after the decease of the said Roger Morris, to the only use and behoof of such person or persons, and in such manner and form as the said Mary Philipse shall, at any time during the said intended marriage, desire the same by her last will and testament, &c., &c. The marriage took effect; children were born, all before the attainder of their parents in 1779. Mary Morris survived her husband and died in 1825, leaving her children surviving her. This is a clear remainder in fee to the children of Roger Morris and wife, which ceased to be contingent on the birth of the first child, and opened to let in after-born children.

Carver v. Astor, (1) 761

2. It is perfectly consistent with this limitation that the estate in fee might be defeasible and determinable upon a subsequent contingency; and upon the happening of such contingency, might pass by way of shifting executory use to other persons in fee, thus making a fee upon a fee.

Id., (Ib.) 761

3. The general rule of law founded on public policy is that limitations of this nature shall be construed to be vested when, and as soon as they may vest. The present limitation in its terms purports to be contingent only until the birth of a child, and may then vest. The estate of the children was contingent only until their birth; and when the Confiscation Act of New York passed, they being all born, it was a vested remainder in them and their heirs, and not liable to be defeated by any transfer or destruction of the life estate.

RESPONDENTIA—1.

1. It is not necessary that a respondentia loan should be made before the departure of a ship on the voyage, nor that the money loaned should be employed in the outfit of the vessel, or invested in the goods on which the risk is run.

Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, (436) 211

2. It matters not at what time the loan is made, nor upon what goods the risk is taken. If the risk of the voyage be substantially and really taken; if the transaction be not a device to cover usury, gaming, or fraud; if the advance be in good faith, for a maritime premium, it is no objection to it that it was made after the voyage was commenced, nor that the money was appropriated to purposes wholly unconnected with the voyage.

Id., (437) 211

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

3. The lender on respondentia is not presumed to lend on the faith of any particular appropriation of the money; and if it were otherwise, his security could not be avoided by any misapplication of the fund where the risk was bona fide run upon other goods, and it was not a mere contract of wager and hazard.

Id., (Ib.) 211

4. It seems that the common and usual form of a respondentia bond is that which was used in this case.

SLAVE—2.

1. The Act of the Legislature of Maryland, passed in 1796, ch. 47, sec. 13, declares that "all persons capable in law to make a valid will and testament, may grant freedom to, and effect the manumission of any slave or slaves belonging to such person or persons, by his, her, or their last will and testament, and such manumission of any slave or slaves may be made to take effect at the death of the testator or testators, or at such other period as may be limited in such last will and testament; provided always, that no manumission by last will and testament shall be effectual to give freedom to any slave or slaves, if the same shall be to the prejudice of creditors, nor unless the said slave or slaves shall be under the age of forty-five years, and able to work and gain a sufficient maintenance and livelihood at the time the freedom given shall commence." The time of freedom of the appellee in this case, commenced when he was about eleven years old. Held, that his manumission by will was valid.

Le Grand v. Darnall, (664) 555

2. The Court of Appeals of Maryland has decided that a devise of property, real or personal, by a master to his slave, entitles the slave to his freedom by necessary implication. This court entertains the same opinion.

3. The Act of the Legislature of Maryland passed 19th December, 1791, entitled "An Act concerning the territory of Columbia, and the city of Washington," which by the 6th section provides for the holding of lands by "foreigners," is an enabling act, and applies to those only who could not take lands without the provisions of that law. It enables a "foreigner" to take in the same manner as if he were a citizen.

Spratt v. Spratt, (349) 174

4. A foreigner who becomes a citizen, is no longer a foreigner, within the view of the act. Thus after-purchased lands vest in him as a citizen, not by virtue of the act of the Legislature of Maryland, but because of his acquiring the rights of citizenship.

Spratt v. Spratt, (349) 174

5. Lands in the County of Washington and District of Columbia, purchased by a foreigner, before naturalization, were held by him under the law of Maryland, and might be transmitted to the relations of the purchaser, who were foreigners; and the capacity so to transmit those lands is given absolutely, by this act, and is not affected by his becoming a citizen; but they pass to his heirs and relations, precisely as if he had remained a foreigner.

Id. (1b.) 174

6. The statute of limitations in Kentucky is substantially the same with the statute of 21 James II., ch. 16, with the exception that it substitutes the term of five years instead of six. The English decisions have, therefore, been resorted to in this case, in the construction of the statute of Kentucky, and are entitled to great consideration. They cannot be considered as conclusive upon the construction of a statute passed by a State upon a like subject; for this belongs to the local State tribunals, whose rules of interpretation must be presumed to be founded upon a more just and accurate view of their own jurisprudence.

Bell v. Morrison, (359) 178

7. If the doctrines of the Kentucky courts, in the construction of a statute of that State, are irreconcilable with the English decisions upon a statute in similar terms, this court, in conformity with its general practice, will follow the local law, and administer the same justice which the State court would administer between the same parties.

Nice and technical objections to the notice, where every purpose of substantial justice is effected, ought not to be favored.

Lessee of Powell v. Harman, (241) 411

10. This court has frequently decided that to sustain its jurisdiction in appeals and writs of error, it is not necessary to state in terms upon the record that the Constitution or a law of the United States was drawn in question. It is sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of the 25th section of the Judicial Act, if the record shows that the Constitution or a law of the United States must have been misconstrued, or the decision could not have been made; or that the constitutionality of a State law was questioned, and the decision was in favor of the party claiming under such law.

Wilson v. The Black Bird Creek Marsh Company, (250) 414

11. The act of the Assembly of the State of Delaware, by which the construction of the dam erected by the plaintiffs was authorized, shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks passing through a deep level marsh, adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come in collision with the powers of the general government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States. But the measure authorized by this act stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgement, unless it comes in conflict with the Constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance.

12. S. and M. held land in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, in common under a Connecticut title. A division of the land was made between them, and S. became the tenant of M. of his part of the land thus set off in severalty, under a lease, to be terminated on a notice of one year. S. afterwards obtained a Pennsylvania title to the land leased to him by M., and on a trial in an ejectment for the land brought by M. against S., the Court of Common Pleas of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, held that S., having held the land as tenant of M., could not set up a title against his landlord. Upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in 1825, it was held that "the relation between landlord and tenant could not exist between persons holding under a Connecticut title." The Legislature of Pennsylvania, on the 8th of April, 1826, passed an Act declaring that "the relation of landlord and tenant should exist and be held as fully and effectually between Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania claimants as between citizens of the Commonwealth." The case came again before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Bradford County in favor of M., the landlord, was affirmed; that court having decided that the Act of Assembly of the 8th of April, 1826, was a constitutional act, and did not impair the validity of any contract. S. brought a writ of error to this court, claiming that the Act of the Assembly of Pennsylvania of the 8th of April, 1826, was unconstitutional. Held, that the act was constitutional.

13. Objections to the jurisdiction of this court have been frequently made on the ground that there was nothing apparent on the record to raise the question whether the court from which the case had been brought had decided upon the constitutionality of a law, so that the case was within the provisions of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789. This has given occasion for a critical examination of the section, which has resulted in the adoption of certain principles of construction applicable to it. One of those principles is that if the repugnancy of a statute of a State to the Constitution of the United States was drawn into question, or if that question was applicable to the case, this court has jurisdiction of the cause; although the record should not in terms state a misconstruction of the Constitution of the United States; or that the repugnancy of the statute of the State, to any part of that Constitution, was drawn into question.

14. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which forbids the Legislature of a State to exercise judicial functions.

Id.

15. There is no part of the Constitution of the United States which applies to a State law which divested rights vested by law in an individual, provided its effect be not to impair the obligation of a contract. Id.

(Id.) 469

16. In the case of Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 87), it was stated by the Chief Justice that it might well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government do not prescribe some limits to the legislative power, and he asks, "if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation?" It is nowhere intimated in that opinion that a State statute which divests a vested right, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

17. This court can perceive no sufficient grounds for declaring that the Legislature of Ohio might not repeal the law of that State by which the Court of Common Pleas was authorized to direct, in a summary way, the sale of the lands of an intestate. "Jurisdiction of all probate and testamentary matters" may be completely exercised without possessing the power to order the sale of the lands of an intestate. Such jurisdiction does not appear to be identical with that power, or to comprehend it.

The Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley's heirs, turned out of possession until he shall be paid for lasting and valuable improvements made by him, and directs the court in a suit at law to appoint commissioners to value the same, is repugnant to the seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." The compensation for improvements is a suit at common law, and must be submitted to a jury.

Id.

(525) 507

19. Admitting that the Legislature of Ohio can give an occupant claimant a right to the value of his improvements, and authorize him to retain possession of the land he has improved until he shall have received that value; and assuming that they may annex conditions to the change of possession, which, so far as they are constitutional, must be respected in all courts; still, the Legislature cannot change radically the mode of proceeding prescribed for the courts of the United States, or direct those courts in a trial at common law to appoint commissioners for the decision of questions which a court of common law must submit to a jury.

Id.

(526) 508

20. The inability of the courts of the United States to proceed in suits at common law, in the mode prescribed by the occupant law of Ohio, does not deprive the occupant of the benefit intended him. The modes of proceeding which belong to courts of chancery, are adapted to the execution of the law; and to the equity side of the court he may apply for relief. Sitting in chancery it can appoint commissioners to estimate improvements, as well as rents and profits, and can enjoin the execution of the judgment at law, until its decree shall be complied with. If any part of the act be unconstitutional, the provisions of that part may be disregarded; while full effect will be given to such as are not repugnant to the constitution of the State or the ordinance of 1787. The question whether any of its provisions be of this description, will properly arise in the suit brought to carry them into effect.

21. The Act of the Legislature of Maryland passed in 1796, ch. 47, sec. 13, declares that "all persons capable in law to make a valid will and testament, may grant freedom to, and effect the manumission of any slave or slaves, belonging to such person or persons, by his, her, or their last will and testament, and such manumission of any slave or slaves may be made to take effect at the death of the testator or testators, or at such other period as may be limited in such last will and testament; provided always, that no manumission by last will and testament shall be effectual to give freedom to any slave or slaves, if the same shall be to the prejudice of creditors, nor unless the said slave or slaves shall be under the age of forty-five years, and able to work and gain a sufficient maintenance and livelihood at the time freedom given shall commence." The time of freedom of the appellee in this case commenced when he was about eleven years old. Held, that his manumission by will was valid.

23. This being a suit upon a local statute, giving a particular remedy in the nature of a foreign attachment against garnishees who possess goods, effects, or credits of the principal debtor; the decisions which have been made on the construction of that statute by the State court of Massachusetts are entitled to great respect, and ought, in conformity to the uniform practice of this court, to govern its decisions.

24. Where under a voluntary assignment of an insolvent debtor, the proceeds of all the property received by the assignees under the assignment are insufficient to pay the amount of the just debts and dividends due to the assignees, the established doctrine in Massachusetts is that the assignees cannot be holden as trustees of the debtor, to the creditor who is the plaintiff in an attachment, so as to be chargeable to him in the suit. Even if the assignment were held to be constructively fraudulent in point of law, they would be entitled to retain their own bona fide debts; for as to those, they stand upon equal grounds with any other creditors. This is understood to be the clear result of the cases decided in Massachusetts.

Beach v. Viler, (678) 560

25. The Act of the Legislature of Maryland of 1793, incorporating the Bank of Columbia, one of the sections of which gives to the bank a summary proceeding against debtors to the bank, did not intend to interfere with any legal defense against the claim of the bank the party might have. It does not prescribe the nature of that defense, or deprive him of any which might have been used, had the action been commenced in the usual way.

The Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, (671) 557

26. J. J. died in New Hampshire, seized of real estate in Rhode Island, having devised the same to his daughter, an infant. His executrix proved the will in New Hampshire, and obtained a license from a probate court in that State to sell the real estate of the testator for the payment of debts. She sold the real estate in Rhode Island for that purpose, and conveyed the same by deed; giving a bond to procure a confirmation of the conveyance by the Legislature of Rhode Island. The proceeds of the sale were appropriated to pay the debts of the intestate. Held, that the act of the Legislature of Rhode Island which confirmed the title of the purchasers was valid. The legislative and judicial authority of New Hampshire were bounded by the territory of that State, and could not be rightfully exercised to pass estates lying in another State. The sale of real estate in Rhode Island, by an executrix, under a license granted by a court of probate of New Hampshire, was void; and the deed executed by her of the estate was proprio vigore, inoperative to pass any title of the testator to any lands described therein.

Wilkinson v. Leland et al., (655) 552

27. By the laws of Rhode Island, the probate of a will, in the proper probate court, is understood to be an indispensable preliminary to establish the right of the devisee, and then his title relates back to the death of the testator.

STATUTE OF CHARITABLE USES—3.

See the case of Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor, 99, and the Appendix, on the construction and application of this statute to devises and gifts to charitable uses in the United States.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—1.

1. The statute of frauds of New York is a transcript on this subject of the statute 29 Charles II., ch. 3. It declares that no action shall be brought to charge a defendant on a special promise for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless the agreement, or some memorandum, or note thereof, be in the writing and signed by the party, or by some one by him authorized. The words "collateral" or "original" promise, do not occur in the statute, and have been introduced by courts to explain its objects, and expound its true interpretation.

D'Wolf v. Rabaud et al., (499) 237

2. Whether, by the true intent of the statute of frauds, it was to extend to cases where the collateral promise (so called) was a part of the original agreement, and founded on the same consideration, moving at the same time, between the parties; or whether it was confined to cases where there was already a subsisting debt or demand, and the promise was merely founded upon a subsequent and distinct understanding, might, if the point were entirely new, deserve very grave deliberation. But it has been closed within very narrow limits by the course of the authorities, and seems scarcely open for general examination; at least in those States where the English authorities have been fully recognized and adopted in practice.

Id. (Ib.) 237

3. If A agree to advance B a sum of money for which B is to be answerable, but at the same time it is expressly upon the understanding that C will do some act for the security of A, and enter into an agreement with A for that purpose, it would scarcely seem a case of mere collateral undertaking, but rather a trilateral contract. The contract of B to repay the money is not coincident with, nor the same contract with C to do the act. Each is an original promise though the one may be deemed subsidiary or secondary to the other. The original consideration flows from A, not solely upon the promise of either B or C, but upon the promise of both, diverso intuitu, and each becomes liable to

A, not upon a joint, but a several original undertaking. Each is a direct original promise, founded upon the same consideration.

Id. (500) 237

4. The case of Wain v. Warlters (5 East, 10), was the first case which settled the point that it was necessary in order to escape from the statute of frauds that the agreement should contain the consideration for the promise as well as the promise itself. If it contain it, it has since been determined that it is wholly immaterial whether the consideration be stated in express terms, or by necessary implication. That case has been adopted, to a limited extent, by the courts of New York into its jurisprudence, as a sound construction of the statute.

Id. (501) 238

5. The statute of frauds in Maryland requires written evidence of the contract, or a court cannot decree performance. The words of the statute are "unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized."

Barry v. Coombe, (650) 300

6. A note or memorandum in writing of the agreement between parties is sufficient under the statute of frauds of Maryland; and in order to obtain specific performance in equity, the note in writing must be sufficient to sustain an action at law. The form is not regarded, or the place of signature, provided it be in the handwriting of the party or his agent, and furnish evidence of a complete and practicable agreement. A court of equity will supply no more than the ordinary incidents to such an agreement, such as the ingredients of a complete transfer, usual covenants, &c.

Id. (Ib.) 300

7. An examination of the cases will show that courts of equity are not particular with regard to the direct and immediate purpose for which the written evidence of the contract was created. It is written evidence which the statute requires; and a note or letter, and even in one case a letter, the object of which was to annul the contract, on a ground really not unreasonable, was held to bring a case within the provisions of the statute.

Id. (651) 300

8. Where, in an account stated by the parties, in the handwriting of the defendant, his name being written by him at the head of the account, a balance was acknowledged to be due by him to the complainant in the bill for a specific performance, there was the following credit: "By my purchase of your half, E. B. wharf and premises this day agreed upon between us, $7,578.63;" it was held to be a sufficient memorandum in writing under the statute of Frauds of Maryland, upon which the court could decree a specific performance of the sale of the estate referred to; other matters appearing in evidence, and by the admissions of the defendant in his answer, to show the particular property designated by "your ½ E. B. wharf and premises."

Id. (Ib.) 300

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—2.

1. In cases not absolutely closed by authority, this court has always expressed a strong inclination not to extend the operation of the statute of frauds so as to embrace original and distinct promises, made by different persons at the same time upon the same general consideration.

Townsend v. Sumrall, (182) 390

2. If A says to B, pay so much money to C and I will repay it to you, it is an original independent promise; and if the money is paid upon the faith of it, it has been always deemed an obligatory contract, even though it be by parol; because there is an original consideration moving between the immediate parties to the contract.

Id. (Ib.) 390

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—1.

1. The statute of limitations, instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light, as an unjust and discreditable defense, should have received such support from courts of justice as would have made it what it was intended emphatically to be—a statute of repose. It is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to raise a presumption of payment of a just debt from lapse of time, but to afford security against stale demands after the true state of the transaction may have been forgotten, or be incapable of explanation, by reason of the death or removal of witnesses.

Bell v. Morrison, (360) 178

2. An exposition of the statute of limitations, which is consistent with its true object and import, is that expressed by this court in the case of Wetzell v. Bussard (11 Wheat., 309); "an acknowledgment which will revive the original cause of action, must be unqualified and unconditional—it must show, positively, that the debt is due, in whole or in part. If it be connected with the circumstances which in any manner affect the claim, or if it be conditional, it may amount to a new assumpsit, for which the old debt is a sufficient consideration; or if it be construed to revive the original debt, that revival is conditional, and the performance of the condition, or a readiness to perform it, must be shown."

Id. (362) 179

3. If the bar of the statute is sought to be removed by the proof of a new promise, that promise, as a new cause of action, ought to be proved in a clear and explicit manner, and be in its terms unequivocal and determinate; and if any conditions are annexed, they ought to be shown to have been performed.

Id. (Ib.) 179

4. The admission of a party of the existence of an unliquidated account, on which something is due to the plaintiff, but no specific balance is admitted, and no document produced at the time from which it can be ascertained what the parties understood the balance to be, would not, by the courts of Kentucky, be held sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and let in the plaintiff to prove, aliunde, any balance, however large it may be. It is indispensable for the party to prove, by independent evidence, the extent of the balance due to him, before there can arise any promise to pay it as a subsisting debt.

Id. (365) 180

5. The acknowledgment of a debt by one partner, after a dissolution of the copartnership, is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute, as to the other partners.

Id. (373) 184

6. A dissolution of partnership puts an end to the authority of one partner to bind the other; it operates as a revocation of all power to create new contracts, and the right of partners as such, can extend no further than to settle the partnership concerns already existing, and distribute the remaining funds; and this right may be restrained by the delegation of this authority to one partner.

Id. (370) 183

7. After a dissolution of a partnership, no partner can create a cause of action against the other partners, except by a new authority communicated to him for that purpose.

Id. (373) 184

8. When the statute of limitations has once run against a debt, the cause of action against the partnership is gone.

SUABILITY OF STATES—3.

1. The subpoena issued on the filing of a bill in which the State of New Jersey were complainants, and the State of New York were defendants, was served upon the Governor and Attorney-General of New York sixty days before the return day, the day of the service and return inclusive. A second subpoena issued, which was served on the Governor of New York only, the Attorney-General being absent. There was no appearance by the State of New York. BY THE COURT: This is not like the case of several defendants, where a service on one might be good, though not on another. Here the service prescribed by the rule is to be on the Governor and on the Attorney-General. A service on one is not sufficient to entitle the court to proceed.

The State of New Jersey v. The State of New York, (461) 741

2. Upon an application by the counsel for the State of New Jersey, that a day might be assigned to argue the question of the jurisdiction of this court to proceed in the case, the court said they had no difficulty in assigning a day. It might be as well to give notice to the State of New York, as they might employ counsel in the interim. If, indeed, the argument should be merely ex-parte, the court could not feel bound by its decision if the State of New York desired to have the question again argued.

Id. (Ib.) 741

3. A notice was given by the solicitors for the State of New Jersey to the Governor of the State of New York, dated the 12th of January, 1830, stating that a bill had been filed on the equity side of the Supreme Court, by the State of New Jersey, against the people of the State of New York, and that on the 13th of February following, the court would be moved in the case for such order as the court might deem proper, &c. Afterwards, on the day appointed, no counsel having appeared for the State of New York, on the motion of the counsel for the State of New Jersey for a subpoena to be served on the Governor and Attorney-General of the State of New York, the court said: as no counsel appears to argue the motion on the part of the State of New York, and the precedent for granting it has been established, upon very grave and solemn argument, the court do not require an ex-parte argument in favor of their authority to grant the subpoena, but will follow the precedent heretofore established. The State of New York will be at liberty to contest the proceeding at a future time in the course of the cause, if they shall choose so to do.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—2.

1. The city council of Charleston, exercising an authority under the State of South Carolina, enacted an ordinance by which a tax was imposed on the six and seven per cent. stock of the United States; and in the Court of Common Pleas of the Charleston District, an application was made for a prohibition to restrain them from levying the tax, on the ground that the ordinance violated the Constitution of the United States. The prohibition was granted, and the proceedings in the case were removed to the Constitutional Court, the highest court of law of the State; and in that court it was held that the ordinance did not violate the Constitution of the United States, and a writ of error was prosecuted on this decision to this court. Held, that the question decided by the Constitutional Court was the very question on which the revising power of this court is to be exercised.

Weston et al. v. The City Council of Charleston, (464) 486

2. The power of this court to revise the judgments of State tribunals depends on the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. That section enacts "that a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had," where is drawn in question the validity of a statute, or of an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity, "may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States."

Weston et al. v. The City Council of Charleston. (463) 486

3. A writ of error to this court may be prosecuted where by the judgment of the highest court of the State of South Carolina a prohibition, issued in a State court, to prevent the levying of a tax which was imposed by a law repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, was refused on the ground that the law was not so repugnant to the Constitution.

Id. (464) 468

4. The term suit is certainly a very comprehensive one, and is understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice in which an individual pursues that remedy in a court of justice which the law affords him.

Id. (Ib.) 468

5. The words "final judgment," in the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, must be understood in the section under consideration as applying to all judgments and decrees which determine the particular cause; and it is not required that such judgments shall finally decide upon the rights which are litigated that the same shall be within purview of the section.

Id. (Ib.) 468

6. The judicial department of every government is the rightful expositor of its laws, and emphatically of its supreme law. If in a case depending before any court a legislative act shall conflict with the Constitution, it is admitted that the court must exercise its judgment on both, and that the Constitution must control the act. The court must determine whether a repugnancy does or does not exist, and in making this determination must construe both instruments. That its construction of the one is authority, while its construction of the other is to be disregarded, is a proposition for which this court can perceive no reason.

SURETIES—1.

1. The claims of the United States upon an official bond, and upon all the parties to it, is not released by the laches of the officer to whom the assertion of this claim is intrusted. Such laches have no effect whatsoever on the rights of the United States, as well against the sureties, as the principal in the bond.

Dox v. The Postmaster-General. (325) 163

2. The discharge, by the Secretary of the Treasury of the principal in a bond to the United States, who is imprisoned under a ca. sa. issued against him, and who has assigned all his property for the use of the United States, does not impair or affect the rights of the United States to proceed against sureties for the amount due upon the judgment, and unpaid.

TAXES AND TAXATION—4.

1. See Corporation.

2. See Lands and land titles.

3. The official tax books of the corporation of Washington, made up by the register from the original returns or lists of the assessors laid before the Court of Appeals, he being empowered by the ordinances of the corporation to correct the valuations made by the assessors, are evidence; and it is not required that the assessor's original lists shall be produced in evidence, to prove the assessment of the taxes on real estate in the city of Washington.

Runkendorf v. Taylor's Lessee. (349) 882

4. In an ex-parte proceeding, as a sale of land for taxes under a special authority, great strictness is required. To divest an individual of his property against his consent, every substantial requisite of the law must be complied with. No presumption can be raised in behalf of a collector who sells real estate for taxes to cure any radical defect in his proceedings; and the proof of regularity devolves upon the person who claims under the collector's sale.

Id. (Ib.) 882

5. Proof of the regular appointment of the assessors is not necessary. They acted under the authority of the corporation, and the highest evidence of this fact is the sanction given to their returns.

Id. (Ib.) 882

6. The act of Congress under which the lot in the city of Washington in controversy was sold, required that public notice of the time and place of sale of lots, the property of non-residents, should be given by advertising "once a week" in some newspaper in the city for three months. Notice of the sale of the lot in controversy was published for three months; but in the course of that period, eleven days at one time, at another ten days, and at another eight days transpired in succeeding weeks, between the insertions of the advertisement in the newspapers. "A week" is a definite period of time, commencing on Sunday and ending on Saturday. The notice was published Monday, January 6th, and was omitted until Saturday, January 18th, leaving an interval of eleven days. Still the publication on Saturday was within the week preceding the notice of the 6th, and this was sufficient. It would be a most rigid construction of the act of Congress, justified neither by its spirit nor its language, to say that this notice must be published on any particular day of a week. If published once a week for three months, the law is complied with and its object effectuated.

Id. (Ib.) 882

7. No doubt can exist that a part of a lot may be sold for taxes where they have accrued on such part.

Id. (Ib.) 882

8. The lot on which the taxes were assessed belonged to two persons as tenants in common. The assessment was made by a valuation of each half of the lot. To make a sale of the interest of one tenant in common for unpaid taxes valid, it need not extend to the interest of both claimants; one having paid his tax, the interest of the other may well be sold for the balance.

Id. (Ib.) 882

9. The advertisement purported to sell "half of lot No. 4, in square No. 491;" and the other half was advertised in the same manner as belonging to the other tenant in common. This was not a sufficient advertisement, and a sale made under the same was void.

Id. (Ib.) 882

10. It is not sufficient that in an advertisement of land for sale for unpaid taxes, such a description is given as would enable the person desirous of purchasing to ascertain the situation of the property by inquiry; nor, if the purchaser at the sale had been informed of every fact necessary to enable him to fix a value upon the property, would the sale be valid, unless the same information had been communicated to the public in the notice.

Id. (Ib.) 882

11. The tenth section of the act of Congress provides that real property in Washington, on which two or more years' taxes shall be due and unpaid, may be sold, &c. In this section a distinction is made between a general and a special tax. Property may be sold to pay the former as soon as two years' taxes shall be due; but to pay the latter, property cannot be sold until the expiration of two years after the second years' tax becomes due. The taxes for which the property in controversy was sold, became due, by the ordinance of the corporation, on the 1st day of January, 1821 and 1822. The special tax for paying was charged against the lot in 1820, and became due on the first of January, 1821; but the ground on which it was assessed was not liable to be sold for the tax until the 1st of January, 1823. The first notice of the sale was given on the 6th of December, 1822, nearly a month before the lot was liable to be sold for the special tax of 1820. Held, that the whole period should have elapsed which was necessary to render the lot liable to be sold for the special tax, before the advertisement was published.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

Ronkendorf v. Taylor's Lessee. (349) 882

12. The power of taxing moneyed corporations has been frequently exercised, and has never before, so far as is known, been resisted. Its novelty, however, furnishes no conclusive argument against it.

The Providence Bank v. Billings and Pittman. (514) 939

13. That the taxing power is of vital importance; that it is essential to the existence of government, are truths which it cannot be necessary to re-affirm. They are acknowledged and asserted by all. It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed. We will not say that a State may not relinquish it; that a consideration sufficiently valuable to induce a partial release of it may not exist; but as the whole community is interested in retaining it undiminished, that community has a right to insist that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon it does not appear.

Id. (Ib.) 939

14. The power of legislation, and consequently of taxation, operates on all the persons and property belonging to the body politic. This is an original principle, which has its foundation in society itself. It is granted by all, for the benefit of all. It resides in government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved where property of any description, or the right to use it in any manner, is granted to individuals or corporate bodies.

Id. (Ib.) 939

15. However absolute the right of an individual may be, it is still in the nature of that right that it must bear a portion of the public burdens, and that portion must be determined by the Legislature. This vital power may be abused; but the Constitution of the United States was not intended to furnish the correction of every abuse of power which may be committed to the State governments. The intrinsic wisdom and justice of the representative body, and its relations with its constituents, furnish the only security where there is no express contract, against unjust and excessive taxation, as well as against unwise legislation generally.

TENANCY BY THE COURTESY—1.

1. It seems that the rigid rules of the common law do not require that the husband shall have had actual seisin of the lands of the wife to entitle himself to a tenancy by courtesy, in waste, or what is sometimes styled "wild lands."

Davis et al. v. Mason. (506) 240

2. If a right of entry on lands exists, it ought to be sufficient to sustain the tenure acquired by the husband, where no adverse possession exists.

Id. (508) 241

3. At present it is fully settled in equity that the husband shall have courtesy of trust, as well as of legatesates, of an equity of redemption, of a contingent use, or money to be laid out in lands.

TERRITORIES—1.

1. The Constitution of the United States confers, absolutely, on the government of the Union, the power of making war, and of making treaties. Consequently, that government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty.

The American Insurance Company v. 356 bales of Cotton. (542) 255

2. The usage of the world is, if a nation be not entirely subdued, to consider the holding of conquered territory as a mere military occupation, until its fate shall be determined at the treaty of peace. If it be ceded by treaty, the acquisition is confirmed, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed; either on the terms stipulated in the treaty of cession, or on such as its new master shall impose. On such transfer of territory it has never been held that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and the new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transfers their country transfers the allegiance of those who remain in it, and the law, which may be denominated political, is necessarily changed; although that which regulates the intercourse and general conduct of individuals remains in force until altered by the newly created power of the State.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

TREASURY STATEMENTS—3.

1. An account stated at the Treasury Department which does not arise in the ordinary mode of doing business in that department, can derive no additional validity from being certified under the act of Congress. A treasury statement can only be regarded as establishing items for moneys disbursed through the ordinary channels of the department, where the transactions are shown by its books. In these cases the officers may well certify, for they must have official knowledge of the facts stated.

The United States v. Buford. (29) 591

2. But when moneys come into the hands of an individual, not through the officers of the treasury, or in the regular course of official duty, the books of the treasury do not exhibit the facts, nor can they be known to the officers of the department. In such a case the claim of the United States for money thus in the hands of a third person must be established, not by a treasury statement, but by the evidence on which that statement was made.

Id. (Ib.) 591

TREATIES—2.

1. A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, not a legislative act. It does not generally effect of itself the object to be accomplished, especially so far as its operation is infraterritorial; but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument.

Foster et al. v. Wilson. (314) 435

2. In the United States a different principle is established. Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engage to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.

TRIAL BY JURY—3.

1. The amendment to the Constitution of the United States by which the trial by jury was secured, may, in a just sense, be well construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume to settle legal rights.

Parsons v. Bedford et al. (447) 737

2. The trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. The right to such a trial is, it is believed, incorporated into, and secured in every State constitution in the Union.

TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES—1.

1. Where, by the terms of a deed conveying real estate in trust, to be sold for the benefit of the creditor of the grantor, the trustee is directed to sell the property conveyed by public auction, the trustee was bound to conform to this mode of sale. This was the test of value which the grantor thought proper to require; and it was not competent to the trustee to establish any other; although, by doing so, he might in reality promote the interests of those for whom he acted.

4. Full notice of a trust draws after it all the consequences of a full declaration of the trust, as to all persons chargeable with such notice.

The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v.

5. It is well settled in equity that all persons coming into possession of trust property, with notice of the trust, shall be considered as trustees; and bound, with respect to that special property, to the execution of the trust.

Id. (Ib.) 156

TRUST AND TRUSTEE—3.

USAGE—1.

1. See Bills of Exchange, 4, 5.

2. See Promissory Note, 1.

USURY—1.

1. C. & Co. discounted their notes with the F. and M. Bank of Georgetown, at thirty days; and, in lieu of money, they stipulated to take the post notes of the bank, payable at a future day, without interest, while the post notes were at a discount of one and a half per cent. in the market, at the time of the transaction. Such a contract is usurious. The indorsement of a promissory note of a stranger to the transaction, which was passed to the bank as a collateral security for the usurious loan, although the note itself is not tainted with the usury, yet the indorsement is void, and passes no property to the bank in the note; and the subsequent payment of the original note for which the security was given, and the repayment of the sum received as usury, will not give legality to the transaction.

Gaither v. The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, (37) 43

2. If a note be free from usury in its origin, no subsequent usurious transactions respecting it can affect it with the taint of usury, although an indorser of the note, whose property in it was acquired through an usurious transaction, may not be able to maintain a suit upon it.

Id. (Ib.) 43

3. The act of Assembly of Maryland declares "all bonds, contracts, and assurances whatever, taken on an usurious contract, to be utterly void." And the indorsement of a promissory note for an usurious consideration is a contract within the statute, and was void.

Id. (Ib.) 43

USURY—2.

1. The Branch Bank of the United States at Lexington, Kentucky, discounted a promissory note, reserving interest thereon at the rate of six per centum per annum; it being agreed that the owner of the note should receive the proceeds of the discount in notes of the Bank of Kentucky, at their nominal value, although the same were, at the time of no greater current value than fifty-four per cent. of the said nominal value. Held, that the contract was usurious, and void, and that the bank could not recover of any of the parties to the discounted note.

The Bank of the United States v. Owens, (527) 508

2. A fraud upon a statute is a violation of the statute.

Id. (536) 511

3. A profit made, or loss imposed on the necessities of the borrower, whatever form, shape, or disguise it may assume, where the treaty is for a loan, and the capital is to be returned at all events, has always been adjudged to be so much profit taken upon a loan, and to be a violation of those laws which limit the lender to a specific rate of interest. According to this principle, the lender in this case has taken forty-six per cent. for three years, or at the rate of about fifteen per cent. per annum above his prescribed interest. This is contrary to the provisions of the charter of the Bank of the United States, and against law.

Id. (537) 511

4. Reserving interest as discount is the same as taking the same, since it cannot be permitted by law to stipulate for the receipt or reservation of that which it is not permitted to receive. In those instances in which courts are called upon to inflict penalties upon the lender, whether in a civil or criminal form of action, it is necessarily otherwise; for there the actual receipt is generally necessary to consummate the offense. But where the restrictive policy of a law alone is in contemplation, we hold it to be an universal rule that it is unlawful to contract to do that which it is unlawful to do.

Id. (538) 512

5. The charter of the Bank of the United States forbids the taking of a greater rate of interest than six per centum, but it does not declare a contract on which a greater interest has been taken or reserved, to be void. Such a contract is void upon general principles. Courts of justice are instituted to carry into effect the laws of a country, and they cannot become auxiliary to the violation of those laws. There can be no civil right where there can be no legal remedy, and there can be no legal remedy for that which is itself illegal.

Id. (Ib.) 513

USURY—3.

1. The taking of interest in advance upon the discount of a note in the usual course of business by a banker, is not usury. This has been long settled, and is not now open for controversy.

Thornton v. The Bank of Washington, (40) 595

2. The taking of interest for sixty-four days, on a note, is not usury, if the note given for sixty days, according to the custom and usage in the banks at Washington, was not due and payable until the sixty-fourth day. In the case of Renner v. The Bank of Columbia (9 Wheat., 581), it was expressly held, that under that custom the note was not due and payable before the sixty-fourth day, for until that time the maker could not be in default.

Id. (Ib.) 595

3. Where it was the practice of the party who had a sixty-day note discounted at The Bank of Washington, to renew the note by the discount of another note on the sixty-third day, the maker not being in fact bound to pay the note according to the custom prevailing in the District of Columbia; such a transaction on the part of the banker is not usurious, although on each note the discount for sixty-four days was deducted. Each note is considered as a distinct and substantive transaction. If no more than legal interest is taken upon the time the new note has to run, the actual application of the proceeds of the new note to the payment of the former note before it comes due, does not of itself make the transaction usurious. Something more must occur. There must be a contract between the bank and the party at the time of such discount, that the party shall not have the use and benefit of the proceeds until the former note becomes due, or that the bank shall have the use and benefit of them in the meantime.

USURY—4.

1. S. being seized in fee of four brick tenements and lots of ground in Alexandria, in consideration of five thousand dollars, granted to M. an annuity or yearly rent charge of five hundred dollars, to be issuing out of and charged upon the houses and ground, and covenanted that the same should be paid to M., his heirs and assigns forever thereafter, with the right to distrain in the case of nonpayment of the same. In the deed granting the rent charge, M., the grantee, covenanted that at any time after five years, on the payment of five thousand dollars with all arrears of rent, he, M., would release the said rent charge, and the same should cease. S.

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

covenanted to keep the buildings in repair, and that he would have them fully insured against fire, and assign the policy of insurance for the protection of M., the money from the insurance to be applied to the rebuilding or repairing the houses, if destroyed or injured by fire. Afterwards, S., by deed of bargain and sale, conveyed to L., the plaintiff in error, the houses and lots of ground subject to the payment of the rent to M., who since the same conveyance has been seized of the same. The rent being unpaid, M. levied a distress for the same, and L. brought replevin; and the defense to the claim for rent set up to the avowry was that the transaction was usurious, and the deed granting the rent charge was, by the laws of Virginia, absolutely void. The statute of Virginia of 1793 provides that no person shall take, directly or indirectly, more than six per cent. per annum on loans of money or for forbearance for one year; and it declares that all bonds and other instruments for a greater amount of interest shall be utterly void.

Lloyd v. Scott, (205) 833

3. The requisites to form an usurious transaction are, 1. A loan either expressed or implied. 2. An understanding that the money lent shall or may be returned. 3. That a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the statute shall be paid. The intent with which the act is done is an important ingredient to constitute this offense.

Id. (Ib.) 833

4. An ignorance of the law will not protect a party from the penalties of usury, where it is committed: but where there was no intention to evade the law, and the facts which amount to usury, whether they appear upon the face of the contract or by other proof, can be shown to have been the result of mistake or accident, no penalty attaches.

Id. (Ib.) 833

5. The act of usury has long since lost that deep moral stain which was formerly attached to it; and is now generally considered only as an illegal or immoral act, because it is prohibited by law.

Id. (Ib.) 833

6. If the court were in this case limited by the pleas to the words of the contract, and it purported to be a purchase of an annuity, and no evidence were adduced giving a different character to the transaction; the argument that, though the annuity may produce a higher rate of interest than six per cent. upon the consideration paid for it, as it was a purchase it was legal, would be unanswerable. An annuity may be purchased like a tract of land or other property; and the inequality of price will not of itself make the contract usurious. If the inadequacy of consideration be great in any purchase, it may lead to suspicion; and connected with other circumstances, may induce a court of chancery to relieve against the contract.

Id. (Ib.) 833

7. In this case five thousand dollars were paid for a ground rent of five hundred dollars per annum. This circumstance, although ten per cent. be received on the money paid, does not make the contract unlawful. If it were a bona fide purchase of an annuity, there is an end of the question; and the condition which gives the option to the vendor to re-purchase the rent by paying the five thousand dollars after the lapse of five years, would not invalidate the contract. The right to re-purchase, as also the inadequacy of price, would be circumstances for the consideration of a jury.

Id. (Ib.) 833

8. The purchase of an annuity, or any other device used to cover an usurious transaction, will be unavailing. If the contract be infected with usury, it cannot be enforced.

Id. (Ib.) 833

9. If a party agree to pay a specific sum exceeding the lawful interest, provided he do not pay the principal by a day certain, it is not usury. By a punctual payment of the principal, he may avoid the payment of the sum stated, which is considered as a penalty. Where a loan is made, to be returned at a fixed day, with more than the legal rate of interest, depending on a casualty which hazards both principal and interest, the contract is not usurious; but where the interest only is hazarded, it is usury.

Id. (Ib.) 833

10. All the material facts to constitute usury are found in the second plea. It states a corrupt agreement to loan the money at a higher rate of interest than the law allows. That the money was advanced, and the contract executed according to such agreement. That on the return of the principal with the full payment of the rent, after the lapse of five years, the annuity was to be released. The amount Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

agreed to be paid above the legal interest for the forbearance is not expressly averred, but the facts are so stated in the plea as to show the amount with certainty. Five hundred dollars, under cover of the annuity, were to be paid annually for the forbearance of the five thousand dollars; making an annual interest of ten per cent. These facts, uncontradicted as they are, amount to usury. It is evident from this statement of the case, that the annuity was created as a means for paying the interest until the principal should be returned, and as a disguise for the transaction. Such is the legitimate inference which arises from the facts stated in the plea.

Id. (Ib.) 833

11. The principle seems to be settled that usurious securities are not only void as between the original parties, but the illegality of their inception affects them even in the hands of third persons, who are entire strangers to the transactions. A stranger must "take heed to his assurance at his peril;" and cannot insist on his ignorance of the corrupt contract, in support of his claim to recover upon a security which originated in usury.

Id. (Ib.) 833

12. In the case of D'Wolf v. Johnson (10 Wheat., 367), the first mortgage being executed in Rhode Island in 1815, was not usurious by the laws of that State; and the second mortgage executed in Kentucky in 1817, being a new contract, was not tainted with usury. The question, therefore, whether the purchaser of an equity of redemption can show usury in the mortgage to defeat foreclosure, was not involved in that case.

Id. (Ib.) 833

13. The law of Virginia having declared that a contract infected by usury is void, and by the deed from S. to M., a right to enter on the premises and distrain for the rent being claimed under a deed, which, upon the admissions in the pleadings, is usurious; and the premises upon which the distress was made being held by L. under a conveyance from S., L. may set up the defense of usury in the deed against the summary remedy asserted by M. under the deed.

Id. (Ib.) 833

VENDOR AND VENDEE—1.

1. In contracts for the sale of land, by which one agrees to purchase and the other to convey, the undertakings of the respective parties are always dependent, unless a contrary intimation clearly appears.

The Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, (464) 222

2. Although many nice distinctions are to be found in the books upon the question whether the covenants or promises of the respective parties to the contract are to be considered independent or dependent; yet it is evident the inclinations of courts have strongly favored the latter construction, as being obviously the most just.

Id. (465) 223

3. In such cases, if either vendor or vendee wish to compel the other to fulfill his contract, he must make his part of the agreement precedent, and cannot proceed against the other without actual performance of the agreement on his part, or a tender and refusal.

Id. (Ib.) 223

4. An averment of performance is always made in the declaration upon contracts containing dependent undertakings, and that averment must be supported by proof.

Id. (Ib.) 223

5. The time fixed for the performance of a contract is at law deemed the essence of the contract, and if the seller is not ready and able to perform his part of the agreement on that day, the purchaser may elect to consider the contract at an end. But equity, which from its peculiar jurisdiction is enabled to examine into the cause of delay, in completing a purchase, and to ascertain how far the day named was deemed material by the parties, will, in certain cases, carry the agreement into execution, although the time appointed has elapsed.

Id. (Ib.) 223

6. It may be laid down as a rule that, at law, to entitle the vendor to recover the purchase money, he must aver in his declaration performance of the contract on his part, or an offer to perform, at the day specified for the performance. And this averment must be sustained by proof, unless the tender has been waived by the purchaser.

Id. (467) 224

7. If before the period fixed for the delivery of a deed for lands the vendee has declared he would not receive it, and that he intended to abandon the contract, it may render a tender of the deed before the institution of a suit unnecessary. But this rule can never apply, except in cases where the act which is construed into a waiver, occurs previous to the time for performance.

The Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, (467) 224

8. The taking possession of property by the vendee before conveyance, is a circumstance from which is to be inferred that he considered the contract closed, but would not deprive him of the right to relinquish the property if the vendor could not make a title, or neglected to do so. After a relinquishment for such causes, the vendee could sustain an action to recover back the purchase money had it been paid.

Id. (468) 224

9. Where the legal title cannot be conveyed to the vendee by the vendor, and the vendee must resort to a court of equity to establish his title, notwithstanding a conveyance of all the right of the vendor to him, the court will not compel him to pay the purchase money. It would be compelling him to take a lawsuit, instead of the land.

VIRGINIA LAND TITLES—3.

See Land and land titles, 1, 2, 3, 4.

WASTE—2.

1. Action on the case against the defendant for waste, committed by him while tenant of the plaintiff, the owner of the reversionary interest, by pulling down and removing from the demised premises a dwelling-house erected thereon, and attached to the freehold. The question raised in the case was, what fixtures erected by the tenant during his term are movable by him. The general rule of the common law undoubtedly is that whatever is once annexed to the freehold becomes part of it, and cannot be afterwards removed, except by him who is entitled to the inheritance. This rule, however, never was inflexible, and without exceptions. It was construed most strictly between executor and heir, in favor of the latter; and more liberally between tenant for life and in tail, and remainderman or reversioner, in favor of the former; and tenant, in favor of the tenant. A more extensive exception to the rule has been of fixtures erected for the purposes of trade. Fixtures which were erected to carry on trade and manufactures, were from an early period of the law allowed to be removed by the tenant, during his term, and were deemed personalty for many other purposes.

Van Ness et ux. v. Pacard, (143) 376

2. It might deserve consideration whether, if the rule of the common law of England which prohibits the removal of fixtures erected by the tenant for agricultural purposes were not previously adopted in a State by some authoritative practice or adjudication; it ought to be assumed by this court, as a part of the jurisprudence of such State, upon the mere footing of its existence in the common law.

Id. (145) 377

3. The question whether fixtures erected for the purposes of trade are or are not removable by the tenant, does not depend upon the form or size of the building; whether it has a brick foundation or not, or is one or two stories high, or has a brick or other chimney. The sole question is, whether it is designed for the purposes of trade or not.

Id. (146) 377

4. If the house were built principally for a dwelling-house for the family, independently of carrying on a trade, then it would doubtless be deemed a fixture falling under the general rule, and irremovable. But if the residence of the family were merely an accessory for the more beneficial exercise of the trade, and with a view to superior accommodation in this particular, then it is within the exception.

Id. (147) 378

WILLS AND TESTAMENTS—1.

1. Under the law of the State of Kentucky, and the decisions of their courts upon it, a will with two witnesses is sufficient to pass real estate; and the copy of such a will, duly proved and recorded in another State, is good evidence of the execution of the will.

Davis et al. v. Mason, (508) 241

2. It is a settled rule in Kentucky that although more than one witness is required to subscribe a will disposing of lands, the evidence of one may be sufficient to prove it.

Id. (509) 241

3. Where a legacy for which suit is instituted is given jointly to several persons in different families, and the legatees take equally, the number in neither family being ascertained by the will, all the claimants ought to be brought before the court. The right of each individual depends on the number who are entitled, and this number is a fact which must be inquired into, before the amount to which anyone is entitled can be fixed. If this fact were to be examined in every case, it would subject the executors to be harassed by a multiplicity of suits, and if it were to be fixed by the first decree, would not bind persons who were not parties.

Pray et al. v. Belt et al., (681) 314

4. The testator in his will says, "whereas my will is lengthy, and it is possible I may have committed some error or errors, I therefore authorize and empower, as fully as I could do myself if living, a majority of my acting executors, my wife to have a voice as executrix, to decide in all cases, in case of any dispute or contention: whatever they determine is my intention, shall be final and conclusive, without any resort to a court of justice." Clauses of this description have always received such judicial construction as would comport with the reasonable intention of the testator.

Id. (679) 313

5. Even where the forfeiture of a legacy has been declared to be the penalty of not conforming to the injunction of a will, courts of justice have considered it, if the legacy be not given over, rather as an effort to effect a desired object by intimidation than as concluding the rights of the parties. If an unreasonable use be made of such a power so given in a will; one not foreseen, and which could not be intended by the testator, it has been considered as a case in which the general power of courts of justice to decide on the rights of parties ought to be exercised.

Id. (680) 313

6. There cannot be such a construction given to such a clause in a testator's will as will prevent a party who conceives himself injured by the construction from submitting his case to a court of justice. A court must decide whether the construction of the will adopted by those who are named is the right construction, or the grossest injustice might be done.

Id. (Ib.) 313

WILLS AND TESTAMENTS—3.

The intent of the testator is the cardinal rule in the construction of wills; and if that intent can be clearly perceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail; although in giving effect to it, some words should be rejected or so restrained in their application as to change their literal meaning in the particular instance.

Finlay et al. v. King's Lessee, (377) 712

WRIT OF ERROR—3.

1. See Amendment, 1.

2. If the writ of error be brought by the plaintiff below, then the sum which the declaration shows to be due may be still recovered, should the judgment for a smaller sum be reversed; and consequently the whole sum claimed is still in dispute.

Gordon v. Ogden, (34) 593

3. But if the writ of error be brought by the defendant in the original action, the judgment of this court can only affirm that of the Circuit Court, and consequently the matter in dispute cannot exceed the amount of that judgment. Nothing but that judgment is in dispute between the parties.

Id. (Ib.) 593

4. The court has no authority, on a writ of error from a State court, to declare a State law void on account of its collision with a State constitution;

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

it not being a case embraced in the Judiciary Act, which gives the power of a writ of error to the highest judicial tribunal of the State.

Jackson v. Lamphire, (280) 679

5. The record consisted of the petition, the answer, the whole testimony, as well depositions as documents, introduced by either party, and the fiat of the judge, that Armor, the plaintiff below, recover the debt as demanded. The difficulty is to decide under what character we shall consider this reference to the revising power of this court. If treated strictly as a writ of error, it is certainly not an attribute of that writ, according to the common law doctrine, to submit the testimony as well as the law of the case to the revision of this court; and then there is no mode in which the court can treat this case, but in the nature of a bill of exceptions. The court is not at liberty to treat this case as an appeal in a court of equity jurisdiction under the Act of 1803; because the party has not brought up his cause by appeal, but by writ of error.

Parsons v. Armor and Oakley, (425) 729

Peters 1, 2, 3, 4.

WRIT OF RIGHT—3.

1. In writ of right the tenant may, on the mise joined, set up a title out of himself and in a third person. If anything which fell from this court in the case of Greeno v. Lister (8 Cranch, 229) can be supposed to give countenance to the opposite doctrine, it is done away by the explanation given by the court in Greene v. Watkins (7 Wheaton, 31). It is there laid down that the tenant may give in evidence the title in a third person for the purpose of disproving the demandant's seisin; that a writ of right does bring into controversy the mere right of the parties to the suit; and if so, it by consequence authorizes either party to establish by evidence that the other has no right whatever in the demanded premises: or that his mere right is inferior to that set up against him.

Inglis v. The Trustees of the Sailor's Snug Harbor, (133) 629
